SECTION I, PART A: MULTIPLE-CHOICE QUESTIONS

Questions 1–3

Beginning in the 17th century, early British colonies, such as those in the Chesapeake region and North Carolina, became wealthy through the cultivation of tobacco, a lucrative export business targeted at European merchants. Although slavery would later become the preferred mode of labor, early workers were indentured servants. Indentured servants were largely poor people from England, Ireland, and France who were lured across the Atlantic by the promise of a new life, freedom, adventure, and job security. Most indentured servants were young males, some were children, and some who were not persuaded to go willingly would be kidnapped and taken to America. Once on American soil, they signed 5- to 10-year contracts, committing to a term of labor. The lives of indentured servants were often harsh and dangerous; some died before their contracts expired.

1. B You can find clues within Hofstadter's quote: the "labor supply" is from England (not Africa) and they "committed themselves," so they cannot be enslaved people, (A). Although some of them may have been "given to crime," there is no evidence that they were convicted inmates, (C). There is no mention of religious freedom, so rule out (D).
2. A Using the clues described above, these workers are indentured servants. Indentured servants were hired to work in agriculture. "Manufacturing" as we now know it would not have existed in 1750, so rule out (B). Choice (D) is testing your knowledge of Bacon's Rebellion, an uprising by indentured servants in Virginia in 1676. It did not lead to a decline in slavery; in fact, many enslaved people were brought in to replace the indentured servants after 1676. So, that leaves (A) and (C). As you may know, the cotton gin was not invented until 1793. Cotton production is linked to slavery. The indentured servants of the 17th and 18th centuries were more likely hired to work in southern tobacco plantations.
3. C The people described in the quote are indentured servants, since they came from England and "committed themselves" to labor in America and the West Indies. So where was labor most needed in 1750? Not in northern New England, (A), since the harsh climate and rocky soil allowed for only small subsistence farms. New Amsterdam, (B), was a small Dutch settlement created to protect Dutch interest in the fur trade. In the 1700s, Western Pennsylvania was mostly settled by migrants from places outside of England such as the German states. That leaves (C). The Chesapeake region was known for its cultivation of tobacco and import of indentured servants.

Questions 4–6

During the Lincoln–Douglas debates of 1858, Abraham Lincoln appeared on the national scene as an antislavery Republican. He ran against the incumbent Senator Stephen Douglas in the U.S. Senate race in Illinois. Lincoln challenged Douglas to a series of debates in which he deftly explained his belief that the nation’s opposition to slavery could not be grounds for compromise, and challenged the fundamental morality of Douglas’s support of the Dred Scott decision and the Kansas-Nebraska Act.

4. C Lincoln is talking about slavery given the year (1858), but make sure that the answer fits with Lincoln’s actual argument. Choice (D) does not work because Lincoln never explicitly says this anywhere in the passage. Choice (B) could make sense, but it’s using words from the passage out of context (he’s not calling the founders misguided). Choice (A) could be true because Lincoln says that the government “had no power to confer such a boon,” but notice he’s speaking in the past tense, meaning he doesn’t necessarily believe this is true now. Choose (C) because Lincoln says that “enforcement of equality might follow as fast as circumstances should permit,” implying the process is ongoing.
5. B Consider which groups would go along with the idea expressed here that equality is a gradual process (see the previous question). Abolitionists and temperance activists often worked hand in hand during the early 1800s and demanded equality now (and not at some nebulous point in the future), so both would probably have some problems with Lincoln’s argument here. On the other hand, in 1858, Lincoln was running against Northern Democrat Stephen Douglass for senator, and the Democrats were still committed to maintaining slavery as it was, so eliminate (A). The position Lincoln advocates here is probably closest to the Free Soil one, so (B) is the best answer.
6. A Toward the end of the excerpt, Lincoln mentions “all people, of all colors, everywhere,” so he is explicitly talking about race. He does not explicitly mention slavery, (C), and South Carolina’s secession, (D), does not occur until 1860. Choice (B) may seem close, but the excerpt is about human rights, not the threat of war.

Questions 7–10

The Treaty of Fort Laramie was an agreement between the United States and the Sioux Nation signed in 1868, which purported to grant ownership of the Black Hills, South Dakota, to the Sioux, thus denying the possibility of white settlement in the area. As with other treaties of its kind, the Treaty of Fort Laramie was broken, in part, because of the discovery of gold in the Black Hills. The excerpt from the ruling in United States v. Sioux Nation of Indians (1980) documents the fact that General George A. Custer was instrumental in luring white people to the Black Hills region and thus violating the terms of the treaty.

7. A The Treaty states that “no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of” the land in question, so white settlement of this area in the 1870s was a clear violation of the treaty. After white people began to prospect for gold in the Black Hills, General Custer was defeated by the Sioux at the Battle of Little Bighorn, one in a series of battles instigated by the violation of the treaty.
8. C The Treaty of Fort Laramie was signed in 1868, while Custer’s journey from Fort Abraham Lincoln commenced in 1874. You can infer from these dates that it was only a few short years from the signing of the treaty before white people began to enter the Black Hills region. This directly contradicts (A). Choice (B) is unlikely, since the violations of treaties led to more uncertainty for Native

Americans. Choice (D) is unsupported by the information given, and is incorrect. In fact, United States v. Sioux Nation of Indians ruled that the Sioux nation had incurred damages from the violation of the treaty and awarded it several million dollars in compensation.

9. C The Treaty states that “no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of” the land in question, so rule out (A) and (B). Choice (D) is too extreme, since there is a provision in Article XVI for white people to travel through the region “with consent.”
10. A Here, consider what federal Indian policy was like in the mid-20th century, which would probably be around the New Deal Era to the time that the second source was written. Courts have issued favorable rulings to indigenous groups but have never ruled that land needs to be returned to them, so eliminate (B). While the federal government did try to enforce policies including establishing reservations and cultural assimilation (through the Indian Removal Act and Dawes Act, respectively), those were all in the 1800s, eliminating both answers. Choice (A) is the best answer because the Indian Reorganization Act during the New Deal did exactly what the answer describes.

Questions 11–14

The table measures the foreign-born population of the United States every 10 years (census years) from 1850 to 2010. The trend is toward a general increase in foreign-born residents, but with a sharp decline from 1930 to 1970. Thus, there is a clear indication that immigration trends must have changed in the years before 1970. You can infer that the children of foreign-born people were then citizens, thus not accounted for in this table, but you can also infer that there must have been a decrease in immigration, and no displacement of the foreign-born numbers. Then there’s a spike in foreign-born residents from 1980 onward.

11. B The overall trend is toward greater immigration from all areas of the world. The one constant in the United States since 1870 has been progressive industrialization.
12. C The question is asking about the total foreign-born population, so (B) is too narrow. Choice (D) is also too narrow and occurred too early to affect the population in 1960. Choice (A) is incorrect. The need for agricultural labor likely increased in the 20th century and would not have affected all ethnic groups.
13. A Nativism is a term that refers to a native population’s desire to limit foreign immigration and promote the interests of the native-born. Literacy tests, (B), were used by labor unions throughout the 1890s to 1920s to exclude non-English-speaking immigrants from the labor pool. Eugenics, (C), was popular following World War I. Eugenists sought to maintain what they thought to be the racial purity of the United States from European immigrants they considered inferior; thus, they would have been skeptical of immigration. The Ku Klux Klan, (D), was a white nationalist group based largely in the South. Although it started as a reaction to the emancipation of enslaved people after the Civil War, the KKK quickly expanded as a reaction to foreign immigration, including antisemitism and anti-Catholicism within its milieu. That leaves us with settlement houses, (A). Settlement houses, such as Hull House started by Jane Addams, sought to help immigrants in major cities by providing them with financial assistance, education, and healthcare.
14. D According to the chart, immigration exploded during the latter half of the 20th century. Most of these immigrants were from Latin America; they settled in California and other areas of the Southwest. Numbers of immigrants have always been high in New York City, but California has experienced a higher number of newcomers than even this melting pot.

Questions 15–17

President William McKinley was a powerful, pro-business Republican. He sponsored the legislation that created the eponymous McKinley Tariff, which raised taxes on many goods by about 50 percent. The primary purpose of tariffs was not to raise revenue, but to boost American businesses by giving them a price advantage over foreign competitors.

15. A According to McKinley's quote, "Under free trade the trader is the master and the producer the slave..." and "protection...is where labor wins its highest rewards." So, in McKinley's view, free trade is disadvantageous to both American businesses and their employees. Protectionism does not lower prices on goods, (C), since McKinley believes there is a "maxim...a thousand times better" than "Buy where you can buy the cheapest."
16. B Since McKinley was a Republican, rule out (A). Know-Nothings, (C), were concerned with immigration issues. Whigs, (D), disbanded before the Civil War.
17. A McKinley does not mention tariffs in the excerpt, but he is well known for the protective McKinley tariff, along with some minor tariffs designed to give American businesses a boost over foreign competition. Choice (B) would not be helpful to American businesses. While (C) may be a by-product of tariffs, this answer is too broad and does not differentiate between American and foreign goods.

Questions 18–20

Larson's quote explains in detail what comprised the Market Revolution: a transition throughout the 19th century from an agricultural economy to an industrial one. The North developed first, where new factories sprang up, using new methods of production such as interchangeable parts (parts made to a standard so that they can be easily replaced). Urban centers grew as people migrated from the farmlands to the cities. Improvements in transportation and communication systems were in demand to keep pace with industrial expansion. Railroad networks were built throughout the North, and the use of the telegraph aided in running this sprawling network. In time, the South caught up to these changes, and today the United States is a largely industrial nation.

18. D Use Process of Elimination. Sectional tensions, (A), would have been high before the Civil War, due to divisions over slavery. Choices (B) and (C) were not natural outgrowths of the Market Revolution, since many young women worked in factories, and industrialization created deeper divisions between the wealthy factory owners and poorer factory workers. Choice (D) is correct, since the invention of the cotton gin by Eli Whitney allowed for the efficient removal of seeds from cotton tufts. Coupled with enormous English demand for huge quantities of cotton, this encouraged the South to continue to focus on cotton production, which in turn fueled increased demand for slave labor.
19. B Following the Civil War, many factors contributed to the rapid rise of industrialization and manufacturing. Remember these important ones: abundant natural resources, a large and available pool of labor (ex-soldiers, freed enslaved people, immigrants, women, and children), improved transportation (railroads), and other new technologies (such as the telegraph).
20. A Improvements in transportation, such as the building of railroads, invention of the steamship for river trade, and improvements to roads and canals, all allowed for more efficient trade. Choice (B) occurred during the same time, but was not a direct cause of industrialization. If anything, it may have been a result, since many immigrants came to America to take the jobs that had already become available in city factories. Abolition, (C), is unrelated to the Market Revolution, and (D) is in the wrong time period: tariffs came in after American industry had already established itself.

Questions 21–23

Baltzer v. United States (1919) and Schenck v. United States (1919) were landmark Supreme Court cases which ruled that speech intended to result in a crime, that poses a “clear and present” danger, is not protected speech under the First Amendment. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes was one of the dissenters in the Baltzer case, and the excerpt here expresses his opinion that there is danger in the impulse to suppress unpopular speech and that “it is better for those who have unquestioned and almost unlimited power in their hands to err on the side of freedom.”

21. B Since Holmes’s quote is concerned with the tendency toward “intolerance of opinions and speech” and “freedom,” the First Amendment is most relevant to these sentiments. The First Amendment guarantees freedom of speech.
22. A Holmes is addressing the need to tolerate opinions and speech that might be “opposed to our own.” Choice (B) does not involve speech, so eliminate it. Although the speech of activists associated with women’s suffrage, (C), or nativism, (D), may have been unpopular with some, these people were never arrested by the government for their divergent views. President Wilson did, however, authorize the arrest of many antiwar protestors under the Espionage Act of 1917. The protestors distributed literature encouraging draft dodging, thus leading to the Baltzer v. United States and Schenck v. United States decisions, which ruled that speech encouraging illegal activity was not protected under the First Amendment.
23. A Since Holmes’s quote addresses the issue of freedom of speech, an action which seeks to limit speech or beliefs would be the most directly opposed to his sentiments. In the vanguard of the deep anti-communist sentiment in the 1950s was Senator Joseph R. McCarthy, who led a crusade to rid the government of supposed communists, and their “fellow travelers,” or “sympathizers.” McCarthy’s tactics, which became known as McCarthyism, were ruthless, and his claims were often unsubstantiated. Choice (B) is the opposite of what we are looking for, since antiwar protestors are employing freedom of speech, not denouncing it. Choices (C) and (D) are unrelated to freedom of speech.

This may initially sound like a description of the Civil War, but a careful reading of the excerpt reveals that it is actually describing the British strategy of attempting to manipulate the southern colonies before the American Revolution. According to Frey, “the British strategy of manipulating conflict between the races became a rallying cry for white southern unity and impelled the South toward independence.”

24. B According to Frey, “British military leaders and Crown officials seized upon the idea of intimidating independence-minded white Southerners with the threat of a slave rising,” so knowing the prevalence (or lack thereof) of slave uprisings would help to evaluate the relevance of this statement. Choices (A) and (C) may help to establish raw numbers of enslaved people, but they do not offer any insight into their proclivity to rebel, or white plantation owners’ fears of such rebellions. Choice (D) is vague and irrelevant to Frey’s argument.
25. B Plantation systems developed to produce single crops, such as tobacco, rice, indigo, and, later, cotton—also known as cash crops because they were sold as well as consumed by the growers. This type of farming was labor-intensive and opened the door for the slave trade, which had been carried on by English merchants since at least the 16th century, and which increased steadily throughout the 17th, 18th, and the first half of the 19th centuries.

Questions 26–28

For newly emancipated enslaved people, Reconstruction brought good news and bad. The good news was that the Thirteenth Amendment, which prohibited slavery, was passed. The bad news was that Southerners passed the Black codes, rules that restricted African Americans from many rights of citizenship.

26. C There are several tempting answers here, but the best answer is the one that is most definitely true based on Finkelman’s statements. The Thirteenth Amendment did abolish slavery, though it did not guarantee full human rights for the emancipated enslaved people, (A), as supported by Finkelman’s quote. Choice (B) is directly contradicted by the quote. Choice (D) is a good trap answer, but this statement is worded in the present tense and is unsupported by the excerpt.
27. D The Populist Party, (A), did not work explicitly toward expanded rights for African Americans. Since Finkelman’s quote includes fulfilling “some of these promises laid out in the Thirteenth Amendment,” (C) cannot be correct. Choice (B) is close, but Progressive reformers were more focused on securing rights for workers, women, and the poor. Only the civil rights movement, (D), would fully ensure equal legal protections for African Americans.
28. A Use Process of Elimination. The Emancipation Proclamation, (D), was not a legal document, per se. The Thirteenth Amendment was the formal legal measure imposed by Congress to free the enslaved people. Choice (B) is not supported by any specific facts; the Supreme Court would not have been necessary to secure rights for African Americans had Congress and the states done that job. Choices (A) and (C) are very close choices, but (A) is better. The Three-Fifths Compromise was used to apportion congressional representation at the founding of the Republic, but it did not, strictly speaking, limit the rights of African Americans. The uncertainty regarding their rights is more clearly due to the lack of explicit mention of slavery in the Constitution.

Questions 29–32

This set of questions is asking you to interpret a cartoon which depicts five presidents (Eisenhower “Ike,” Kennedy “JFK,” Johnson “LBJ,” Nixon, and Ford) lined up like dominoes toppling each other. The caption reads “Domino Theory.” To understand this cartoon, you need to know that all five of these presidents involved U.S. troops in the Vietnam War, spanning from the 1950s to 1975. The term “domino theory” typically refers to the fear that once a certain country adopts a communist form of government, other countries around it will “fall like dominoes” and become communist too. Here, the cartoonist is parodying this notion by showing that the presidents “fell like dominoes,” too, probably because the conflict was transferred from one administration to the next, with increasing public dissatisfaction over the results of the war.

The nation’s approach to Vietnam was the ultimate Cold War policy gone awry. Although the Vietnam War is at its core a story of anti-communists versus communists, the full narrative is much more complicated. The war was waged between the communist North Vietnamese, with support from their Chinese, Soviet, and Viet Cong allies, and the government of South Vietnam, supported by its primary ally, the United States. Following the military defeat and subsequent withdrawal of the French from Indochina, Vietnam was partitioned into northern and southern states. The government of North Vietnam and their Viet Kong allies in the South sought to reunify Vietnam under a single communist government. The United States justified its involvement in Vietnam as part of a larger containment strategy, the crux of which was to stop the expansion of communism on a state-by-state basis, wherever revolutionary elements pursued the establishment of communist rule. This containment doctrine had at its intellectual heart domino theory, which held that if one country in a region fell to communism, all of the nations in that region were then put at risk of falling.

29. D The cartoon portrays the five U.S. presidents who were directly involved in executing military decisions for the Vietnam War. The cartoon is unrelated to the Korean War, (A), or World War II, (C). Choice (B) is incorrect since public sentiment toward the Vietnam War tended to turn more negative, not toward greater support. Choice (D) is the best choice.
30. A The Vietnam War was an attempt to contain the spread of communism in Asia. It was not rooted in a desire to defend human rights, per se, (C). Choice (B) is irrelevant to the cartoon. The Non-Aligned Movement, (D), pertains to a group of smaller countries who have attempted to maintain independence from major countries, so the United States would not have supported this effort, nor was Vietnam a member of this group until 1976, after the war ended.
31. D The Tet Offensive failed in its goal of overthrowing the South Vietnamese government, but it turned the tide of the war nonetheless, as it persuaded many American voters that despite extraordinary effort and enormous sacrifice, the United States was no closer to victory than when the war began. A significant antiwar movement grew throughout the 1960s, which was both a reflection of and a stimulus for the larger countercultural movement of the decade. A growing sense that the United States was mired in a quagmire in Southeast Asia, along with increasingly vocal public opposition to the war, led to a slow but steady reduction in American force levels until President Ford officially ended the war in 1975, (D). Choice (C) may look tempting, but the War Powers Resolution was, in fact, an attempt to curb the executive power to commit troops to war without the consent of Congress. Antiwar activists would not have opposed this idea.

32. D The Korean War, which occurred under Truman, became a stage on which Cold War hostilities were played out. After World War II, Korea had been divided into North Korea, under Soviet control, and South Korea, under American occupation. Following the withdrawal of both Soviet and U.S. troops at the end of World War II, North Korea, led by Soviet-trained military leaders and equipped with Soviet arms, attacked South Korea without provocation, with the declared intention of unifying the Korean peninsula. The initial North Korean invasion across the 38th parallel into South Korea pushed overwhelmed South Korean defenders back to the so-called Pusan Perimeter. Led by America, the United Nations Security Council declared North Korea an aggressor and sent a force led by General MacArthur to the region under orders to defend South Korea.

Questions 33–36

Many strong African American leaders emerged during the Progressive Era. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the National Urban League were multiracial groups founded to combat racial discrimination and pursue political, educational, social, and economic equality for all people. While most African Americans were in favor of racial equality, they were split as to how this could best be achieved. Booker T. Washington, an educator who founded the Tuskegee Institute, an all-Black vocational school (and, later, a university), advocated that, rather than fight for political rights, African Americans should strive for economic equality through job training and hard work. Washington presented these views at the Atlanta Exposition in 1895 in a speech known as the Atlanta Compromise. White people welcomed Washington's views as they advised African Americans to work quietly rather than to agitate openly for equality. In sharp contrast to Washington, W. E. B. Du Bois, who helped found the NAACP, argued that African Americans should aggressively pursue political, social, and economic rights. Du Bois believed that a "Talented Tenth" of the African American population should assume roles of academic and community leadership, advancing the race through intellect and skill.

33. C According to Washington's statements, "artificial forcing" is political action that leads to "agitation of questions of social equality." Choice (C) involves the most direct political action. All of the other answers involve more indirect or individual actions that Washington would support as beneficial to the African American community.
34. A Washington and Du Bois did not disagree upon the roots of African American suffering, (C), or the worthiness of equal rights for all, (B). They did, however, disagree upon the means by which to achieve these goals, (A). Choice (D) is incorrect, since Du Bois does mention that there is a "way for a people to gain their reasonable rights."
35. D Neither speaker mentions desegregation, (B), or violence, (C). They also do not mention other types of social change, (A). Choice (D) is the most reasonable answer and would be a sentiment shared by every civil rights activist of the era.
36. C According to Du Bois's statements, he does "accept the Atlanta Compromise" in its broadest interpretation, (A), and does "not expect that the free right to vote, to enjoy civic rights, and to be educated, will come in a moment," (B). Choice (D) is something with which Washington would disagree, not Du Bois.

Questions 37–39

The map portrays a number of territorial acquisitions, including the Louisiana Purchase, Florida, Oregon Territory, and the lands ceded by Mexico after the Mexican–American War.

37. C The Mexican–American War officially began after Mexican troops crossed the Rio Grande into disputed territory, and President James K. Polk secured a declaration of war. While the progression of the war was neither as easy nor as swift (the war dragged on for more than a year and a half) as Polk had hoped, its outcome was everything that he had desired. With the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo (1848), Mexico acknowledged the Rio Grande as the southern border of Texas and ceded the territories of California and New Mexico to the United States.
38. B Generally, Westerners supported territorial expansion and subscribed to the notion of Manifest Destiny, which held that it was America’s destiny to expand beyond its current boundaries across the North American continent.
39. D These new territories increased the tension between free and slave states in the populace and in Congress. Even as the Mexican–American War was being fought, representatives from the North and the South began disputing how this new territory would be organized, slave or free. The Homestead Act, (A), did not occur until after the Civil War and was not broadly controversial. Choices (B) and (C) were not concerns during the time periods depicted on the map.

Questions 40–41

In this excerpt, Thoreau explicitly advocates the nonpayment of taxes. Specifically, Thoreau protested the Mexican–American War by failing to pay a small poll tax and was subsequently jailed for his actions. The excerpt from Bronson Alcott’s Journals demonstrates that Thoreau’s actions were inspiring to other intellectuals of his time.

40. C All of the events above were happening in the mid-1800s, so consider what context is most relevant to Thoreau’s argument. He was not much of a suffragist, so eliminate (D). Indian Removal had begun in the 1830s and continued well into this time period, but is not what he is referencing here, so eliminate (B). It might seem like Thoreau is referencing slavery, but it’s not his main focus if you read the other stimulus below, which references the Mexican War, so eliminate (A). Choice (C) is the best answer because the Mexican–American War was controversial primarily because of the issue of expansionism.
41. B All of these movements represent rejection of a government policy, but only one of them underlines as being entirely through legal means. The American civil rights movement relied on civil disobedience just as Thoreau says; eliminate (A). Activists like Eugene Debs were jailed for their protests against World War I, and Vietnam War deserters were also punished for burning their draft cards, so eliminate (C) and (D). Choose (B) because the Reagan Revolution represented change mainly through electoral means and not any kind of refusal to obey certain laws.

Questions 42–43

The conservation movement came to prominence during the Progressive Era. Some conservationists, such as John Muir, sought to preserve nature on idealistic grounds, believing that a minimum of human interference with natural resources was always preferable. Other conservationists, however, took a more pragmatic approach, believing that conservation of resources was necessary in order to ensure the continued use of those resources by humans.

42. A Choosing the best answer is a matter of recognizing that the excerpt was written in 1912 (well before the growth of suburban developments, (C)) and is authored by a commission in Massachusetts, far from the Dust Bowl, (B), or buffalo, (D).
43. A This is a law from the early 1900s designed for environmental protection. Given that it's out of Massachusetts (where Populists had little draw), you can eliminate (B). While the source does mention the word "Efficiency" and might remind you of Taylorism's scientific management, it's a red herring. It has nothing to do with industrial efficiency, so eliminate (C). Critics of big government might liken this policy to socialism, but there is a better answer: Part of Teddy Roosevelt's Square Deal included environmental conservation, and as he is the emblem of a Progressive president, (A) is the best answer.

Questions 44–46

In Garry's view, conservatism was "marginalized" from the Great Depression to the 1970s, overshadowed by the New Deal, Great Society, and 1960s countercultural revolution. Conservative ideas survived through "dogged perseverance—a story of unrelenting commitment to a set of ideals rooted in three centuries of American history."

44. D Barry Goldwater, (A), was a conservative presidential candidate in 1964. His loss to Lyndon Johnson (Democrat) could certainly support Garry's argument that conservatives were the underdogs for 50 years. Conservatives would have opposed Great Society programs, (B), designed to raise taxes and spend money on poverty programs. Choice (C) is a tricky answer, but notice that Garry acknowledges the "strength" of conservatism in "current times." He mentions that, "as recently as the late 1970s, conservatism was seen as a permanent minority philosophy in America," implying that the 1980s may have reversed the trend. Choice (D) is the best answer, since the fall of the Berlin Wall is less relevant to American conservatism than the election of a president.
45. A Social conservatives care deeply about traditional family values. They do not usually blame liberals for needless wars, (B), or promote government programs targeted to racial or social groups, (C) and (D).
46. D Christian evangelicals are often conservatives who focus their political energies on social issues regarding traditional family values. Possibly the most divisive social issue since the 1970s has been abortion; after the Supreme Court's decision in Roe v. Wade, social conservatives spent decades mobilizing to overturn the decision and limit access to abortion. Christian evangelicals are less focused on spending issues, (A), than are secular conservatives and they have not been vocally opposed to most wars, (C). Tax cuts, (B), would not be opposed by most Christian evangelicals.

Questions 47–49

In 1787, our newly independent nation convened a Constitutional Convention during which the U.S. Constitution, the foundation for the government of the United States, was written. The Constitution was ratified and passed in 1788, the year in which both of the excerpts were written. Griffin's letter helps to establish that there was some wrangling and uncertainty regarding the various states and whether they would ratify.

47. B The letter from Griffin lists the states that had yet to ratify the Constitution. Madison's letter confirms that the "Convention" had convened and that there were "amendments" to the document. Both speakers are referring to the states about to ratify.
48. A Eliminate (B) and (C), since they occur in the wrong time period. George Washington's presidency, (D), was not controversial. The degree to which states and the federal government would share power is known as federalism, (A), and was the most controversial issue of this time period.
49. B Federalists supported a strong central government, while Jeffersonian anti-Federalists were suspicious of such a government. Jefferson's party was known as the Democratic-Republicans.

Questions 50–52

Directly following the French and Indian War, George Grenville was appointed prime minister of the colonies. He sought tighter control over the American Colonies in order to raise revenues for Great Britain. In addition to stricter enforcement of existing trade laws, Grenville passed other unpopular laws. The Sugar Act (also known as the Revenue Act), which placed new duties on certain foreign goods (not just sugar), basically forced the colonies to conduct all trade through England. Although the Sugar Act resembled the Navigation Acts, by which the colonists had long abided, the fact that it was explicitly designed to raise revenue upset the colonists, who felt as if Britain was trying to take advantage of them. Colonial legislatures sent petitions to Parliament, arguing that the act would hurt trade for Britain as well as the colonies and that the colonists had not consented to the Act's passage. Grenville ignored the colonists' pleas as he proceeded with his plans to increase Britain's revenue.

50. B The excerpt mentions "improving the revenue of this kingdom," "that a revenue be raised...for defraying...expenses." So, raising money was the primary purpose of the Sugar Act.
51. B Laws such as the Sugar Act contributed to colonial unrest, since it reinforced the notion that the colonists were victims of "taxation without representation." Choice (A) may have looked tempting, but this was actually true of the Molasses Act. The Sugar Act was indeed enforced. France, (C), would not have been affected by the Sugar Act, and (D) was true of the Tea Act, not the Sugar Act.
52. A The French and Indian War had been enormously expensive for the British, and they felt that the American colonists did not share equally the burden of the war costs. This led to a cascade of Acts, such as the Sugar Act, designed to raise revenue for Great Britain.

Questions 53–55

The decade following World War II brought general affluence and an improved standard of living for most Americans. The excerpt by James Patterson points out that there was a relatively low level of income inequality in America in the 1950s and 1960s compared to the soaring wealth of the rich in the 1920s and the booming economy of the 1980s and 1990s.

53. B A national minimum wage, (A), would ensure that even the lowest-paid workers in America earn an income beyond a set threshold. The creation of the Securities and Exchange Commission, (C), helped to regulate Wall Street, thus reining in potential corruption at the top. The creation of the Federal Housing Authority (FHA), (D), helped low- and middle-income Americans to more easily purchase a home. The desegregation of the military, (B), would have virtually no impact on income inequality.
54. C This is entirely a test of your knowledge of the era. After World War II, the civil rights movement, (A), experienced some notable victories (Brown v. Board of Education, the Civil Rights Act, etc.). Immigration, (B), began to increase and more women joined the workforce, (D). Choice (C) is the best answer, since the proliferation of the automobile and reliable jobs encouraged many Americans to live in the suburbs.
55. B When Lyndon B. Johnson assumed the presidency, he outlined ambitious goals for the nation, arguing that government should play a greater role in people's lives. He called his vision the Great Society, promising a country in which poverty, disease, and lack of education could and should be eliminated. His most important legislation was the Economic Opportunity Act (1964), which was billed as "The War on Poverty."

SECTION I, PART B: SHORT-ANSWER QUESTIONS

Question 1

The Kansas-Nebraska Act helped set the stage for one of the first violent confrontations stemming from the slavery issue. Because the fate of each locality in the Kansas-Nebraska Act hinged on a popular vote, hundreds of proslavery and antislavery activists poured into the territories in hopes of swaying the outcome of the referendum. Often armed and ready to fight, Kansas became a literal battleground between proslavery and antislavery factions. "Bleeding Kansas," as the region came to be known, was the site of several prominent attacks on opposing groups' settlements. The most famous incident was John Brown's raid, where Brown, a radical slavery opponent, led a group that murdered proslavery settlers. Later John Brown led a separate raid on the U.S. arsenal at Harper's Ferry (then in the state of Virginia) hoping to seize a cache of weapons with which to arm a slave uprising. Brown's raid failed and Brown himself was captured by a detachment of Marines under the command of then Col. Robert E. Lee, tried for treason, and hanged.

Many Republicans, such as Abraham Lincoln, sought to distance themselves from the actions of John Brown. In the excerpt cited, Lincoln denies that Brown's efforts were successful or supported by the enslaved people themselves. He calls his actions "absurd" and merely leading to Brown's own demise.

Many committed abolitionists, on the other hand, maintained that Brown's actions were the natural result of the moral desperation brought on by the continuation of slavery, and praised Brown as a kind of martyr for the cause of abolition. In Emerson's speech, he labels Brown an "idealist" who saw the necessity of action. Emerson refers to the "forms," or social and political institutions which perpetuated slavery, contrasted with the "facts" of moral reality.

- A. An effective answer to part A will highlight differences between Lincoln's and Emerson's positions on John Brown including:
- Whether he was misguided or heroic
 - Whether or not he accomplished anything useful
 - Whether or not his actions were destined for failure
 - Whether Brown was egocentric or self-sacrificing
 - Whether or not violence is effective in promoting a just cause
- B. Lincoln's view is that John Brown was misguided and ineffective and an example of a revolutionary who thought too highly of his own place in history, thus leading to his own demise. This question is asking for an event or development to support his view. You could have used one of the following, being sure to highlight the unsuccessful aspects of these events:
- Bacon's Rebellion
 - Stono Rebellion
 - Nat Turner's Rebellion
 - The seizure of La Amistad
 - Bleeding Kansas
- C. Emerson's view is that John Brown was an idealist whose actions were noble and motivated by the knowledge of truth. This question is asking for an event or development to support his view. You could have used one of the following, or even events from the part (b) list, being sure to highlight the successful or idealistic aspects of these events:
- 1733 slave insurrection on St. John, Virgin Islands
 - Haitian Revolution
 - Civil War

Question 2

In Image 1, you see a family of seven living in a very small room that contains one bed, a crib, and shabby furnishings. The family is dressed in such a manner that we would assume they are low-paid workers, perhaps in a factory. "Tenements" were city apartments for the poor, and in 1910 there would have been little to no government assistance for the poor. Child labor was common in such communities and this family might be recent immigrants.

In Image 2, you see a lavishly appointed bedroom, typical of that of a wealthy family in the Gilded Age. According to the caption, this is the bedroom of the wife of A.T. Stewart, owner of a successful department store in New York City in the late 1800s. Notice that her bedroom is larger than the tenement family's one room, so you can infer that her house is massive in comparison to their dwelling. The two pictures illustrate the great disparities in wealth between the rich and the poor during the height of the Industrial Revolution.

A. Your answer to this question should mention several of the following:

- A move away from agricultural work and rural living to urban factory work
- A large increase in unskilled and semi-literate workers, largely immigrants
- Child labor
- A large number of female workers, especially in textile mills
- Laissez-faire economics
- Social Darwinism
- Virtually no government safety net for the poor (welfare benefits, food stamps, subsidized housing, Medicaid, etc.)
- Few workplace safety regulations
- The rise of labor unions

B. Your answer to this question should mention several of the following:

- The flowering of industry after the Civil War
- “Robber barons”/captains of industry: Carnegie, Rockefeller, Vanderbilt, etc.
- Increased mechanization of industry and assembly-line production leading to the need for large numbers of factory workers
- Low federal income tax rates, encouraging the accumulation of wealth at the top of society
- Laissez-faire economics
- Social Darwinism
- The Gospel of Wealth
- Intermarriage within wealthy families, encouraging a consolidation of wealth
- Inexpensive labor, which allowed for lavish home building among the wealthy

C. Your answer to this question may have focused on one of the following:

- Rise of the Progressive Party
- Muckraking journalism: McClure’s magazine, Ida M. Tarbell’s The History of the Standard Oil Company, Upton Sinclair’s The Jungle, Jacob Riis’s How the Other Half Lives
- The Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890 and Clayton Antitrust Act
- Settlement houses (Jane Addams’s Hull House in Chicago)
- Interstate Commerce Act of 1887
- The growth of labor unions: Knights of Labor; the American Federation of Labor (AFL), led by Samuel Gompers; and the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW), referred to as “Wobblies,” a militant anti-capitalist group
- Union strikes
- State Workmen’s Compensation laws
- Child labor laws
- New Deal reforms: regulation of banks, Social Security, government work programs

Question 3

- A. Territorial expansion increased the tension between free and slave states in Congress. Even as the Mexican–American War was being fought, representatives from the North and the South began disputing how this new territory would be organized, slave or free. The Gold Rush forced the decision; in 1849, California petitioned Congress for admittance into the Union as a free state. President Zachary Taylor, a Whig, supported admittance. Serious talk of secession circulated among Southerners.
- B. The Compromise of 1850 included the following elements:
- California was admitted as a free state, which was a response to Free Soilers who wanted to prevent slavery’s westward expansion
 - A new Fugitive Slave Act was passed granting southern states more authority to capture slaves in free states, as southern states wanted to make it harder for slaves to escape to free territories
 - The trading of slaves was banned in Washington DC (as the slave trade had become a kind of national embarrassment since many rival empires like Britain had already ended their slave trade)
 - The New Mexico and Utah territories were organized around the principle of popular sovereignty, with the hope that residents could determine for themselves whether slavery would be allowed

You only need to pick one of the above to answer the question

- C. The Compromise of 1850 had many important outcomes that you could discuss here:
- The Fugitive Slave Act encouraged more African Americans to seek refuge outside of the US in places like Canada to avoid slave catchers
 - The principle of popular sovereignty became a tool for politicians like Stephen Douglass in later laws the Kansas-Nebraska Act to compromise on slavery
 - The state of California became an important focal point for the Free Soil movement and became a major part of the establishment of the Republican Party thanks to leaders like John C. Fremont
 - Resentments over the Fugitive Slave Law made free states especially upset and catalyzed the abolitionist movement in the 1850s, making compromise over slavery less likely

Again, you only need to pick one of the above to answer the question.

Question 4

This question calls for a brief overview of the history of the Vietnam War, along with a discussion of some of its impacts on American society.

- A. Although the Vietnam War is at its core a story of anti-communists versus communists—not an especially unique one in the annals of Cold War geopolitics—the full narrative is much more complicated. The war was waged between the communist North Vietnamese, with support from their Chinese, Soviet, and Viet Cong (a South Vietnamese communist guerrilla group) allies, and the government of South Vietnam, supported by its primary ally, the United States. The United States justified its involvement in Vietnam as part of a larger containment strategy, the crux of which was to stop the expansion of communism on a state-by-state basis, wherever revolutionary elements pursued the establishment of communist rule. This containment doctrine had at its intellectual heart domino theory, which held that if one country in a region fell to communism, all of the nations in that region were then put at risk of falling. The U.S. military presence in Vietnam increased dramatically following the 1964 Gulf of Tonkin incident. Be sure to mention the following:
- Unlike the Korean War, U.S. casualty rates were much higher.
 - Depending on your point of view, you could argue that the failures of the Vietnam War created more caution in American interventionism (it was not as smooth-sailing as the Korean War) OR that it ended interventionism on grounds of containment (no major conflicts over communism after 1975).

B and C—Effective answers to parts B and C should mention some of the following:

- Protest of the draft, draft-dodging, emigrations to Canada
- Military draft not used since the Vietnam War
- Intense war protests (i.e., Kent State Massacre)
- The Pentagon Papers
- First war to be televised
- Nixon's policy of détente

SECTION II, QUESTION 1: THE DOCUMENT-BASED QUESTION

The document-based question begins with a mandatory 15-minute reading period. During these 15 minutes, you should (1) come up with some information not included in the given documents (your outside knowledge) to include in your essay, (2) get an overview of what each document means, (3) decide what opinion you are going to argue, and (4) write an outline of your essay.

The first thing you will be inclined to do, after reading the question, is to look at the documents. Resist that temptation. Instead, the first thing you should do is brainstorm for several minutes about what the question is asking of you. Try to list everything you remember about the Great Migrations. This list will serve as your reference to the outside information you must provide in order to earn a top grade.

Then, and only then, read over the documents. As you read them, use your scratch paper to take notes and use the highlight feature for those passages that you are certain you are going to refer to in your essay. If a document helps you remember a piece of outside information, add that information to your brainstorming list. If you cannot make sense of a document, don't worry. You may omit mention of one of the documents and still score well on the DBQ.

Here is what you need to look for in each document to get the most out of it:

- the author
- the date
- the audience (for whom was the document intended?)
- the significance

Remember: You are being asked to write 50 percent document interpretation and 50 percent outside information. Don't get so lost in the documents that you forget to bring in outside information. Readers will not be able to give you a high score unless you include both! What readers really don't like is a laundry list of documents: that is, a paper in which the student merely goes through the documents, explaining each one. Those students are often the ones who forget to bring in outside information, because they are so focused on going through the documents.

So, what is this DBQ all about?

This DBQ can be seen in three parts: (1) What motivated the Great Migrations? (2) What were the outcomes of the Great Migrations? And (3) How have the reasons for African American migration changed over time? For the first part, discuss slavery in the South, the end of the Civil War, Jim Crow laws, industrialization in the North, and urbanization. For the second part, discuss economic growth, the establishment of large African American communities in northern cities, and subsequent discrimination in housing ordinances, hiring practices, etc.

In the final part of the essay, use Documents 5, 6, and 7 to demonstrate that the migration patterns of African Americans have recently shifted from "South to North" to "North to South." Some African Americans are seeking to return to the home of their ancestors and are responding, in part, to the recent manufacturing boom and growth of suburbs in southern cities. This net southern migration is, in large part, supported by increased opportunities for those with higher education and continued systemic racism presenting difficulties for African Americans in the workplace in both the North and South.

The Documents

In Document 1, Lemann establishes that the Great Migration of African Americans was significant on a scale that shadows immigration to the United States during this same period. Historians often distinguish between two periods of the Great Migration: the First Great Migration from the end of World War I up to the Great Depression, which involved African Americans moving from southern rural areas to northern industrial cities, and a Second Great Migration after World War II, which brought African Americans not only to the North, but also to the West. The motivations for migration were largely economic, but also social: the attitudes of those in the North were thought to be less racist than those in the South.

Document 2 shows that the Second Great Migration led to decreasing numbers of African Americans in southern cities such as Jacksonville, Nashville, and Birmingham, while many northern and western cities experienced a sharp increase in African Americans. It is important to consider the social and economic issues faced by the United States during these decades in order to find underlying causes of the Second Great Migration. For one, the 1940s saw an increase in manufacturing because of the American entrance into World War II. The postwar economic boom came with an increase in manufacturing jobs, offering further economic incentives for migration. Also consider the persistence of Jim Crow Era discrimination in the South, particularly before the 1954 Brown v. Board of Education case and the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

Document 3 establishes that not all northern cities welcomed African Americans with open arms: in this case, a sign shows that some in Detroit very much did not. Two pieces of Lyndon Johnson’s Great Society legislation connect to this image: the development of the department of Housing and Urban Development and the Housing Rights Act. The department of Housing and Urban Development provided safe, decent housing for low-income Americans. Further, the Housing Rights Act prohibited discrimination in home sales and rentals—the kind of discrimination seen in the image. Some low-income African American migrants moved into government-sponsored housing projects, while others were free to purchase or rent housing anywhere they could afford. This migration led some white people to fear the demographic changes in their cities and brought up decidedly ugly intimidation techniques.

Document 4 shows the increase in population in Chicago over a 150-year time period. A careful study of the racial numbers demonstrates that the numbers of African Americans increased by over 300% after World War II with a slight decrease or stabilization during the 1980s. Note the dramatic jumps. By 1950, following World War II’s industrial boon, the African American population in Chicago increased by over 5%. Over the next decade, that percentage increased by another 10% as U.S. manufacturing continued to grow following the war. Numbers of white people in Chicago declined noticeably during this same time period, likely because of “white flight.”

Document 5 discusses the change in migration patterns in metro areas from a northward trend during and shortly after the civil rights movement of the 1960s to a more recent southward trend due to systemic racism and changes in job opportunities in the North during the late 1970s. This document is helpful in understanding the motivation for the shift in migration toward the southward trend seen today.

Document 6 confirms that the Second Great Migration meant significant increases in the population of African Americans in northern and western states, while the trend in the 1990s was toward increases in southern states. There are many factors at play, including manufacturing jobs disappearing, business moving to the “Sun Belt,” deterioration of urban neighborhoods, and greater opportunities in the workplace for those with higher education in the South.

Document 7 shows the distribution of African Americans in the United States in the year 1950 (prior to the civil rights movement). This graph shows that most African Americans are largely concentrated in the south and in larger urban centers in the Midwest and along the Atlantic Coast.

Outside Information

We have already discussed much more than you could possibly include in a 45-minute essay. Do not worry. You will not be expected to mention everything or even most of what we have covered in the section above. You will, however, be expected to include some outside information—that is, information not mentioned directly in the documents.

Here is some outside information you might have used in your essay. The information is divided into two groups: general concepts and specific events.

General Concepts

- In American history, the movement of African Americans has been about both survival and opportunity. The Great Migration of the early 20th century saw an escape from a violent South, as well as the search for decent industrial jobs in the North. What you want to consider in this essay is the extent to which African Americans found either the security or the economic opportunity promised in the North.
- The migration of African Americans brought with it competition for jobs. Working-class white people, including immigrants, often showed intolerance toward African Americans due to this competition. The dream of a more tolerant North with economic opportunities did not necessarily pan out for all African American migrants.

- One constant from life in the South for African Americans was religious institutions. In the South, Christian churches provided a social infrastructure and organizing vehicle in African American communities. Those institutions were retained following the move to northern cities, often in ad hoc “storefront” churches. Other African Americans found social and economic support in a renewed interest in Islam. The Nation of Islam, for instance, maintained a focus on personal decorum and responsibility in the Black community.
- As occurred in the early days of Reconstruction, African American political representation once again became a reality. In cities that became increasingly African American, some of the first Black mayors were elected. The phenomenon of “white flight” left a primarily Black voting bloc in many regions. Nonetheless, the Black franchise was still not absolute, particularly before the 24th Amendment and the 1965 Voting Rights Act.
- The hope that African American migrants would escape the discrimination and bigotry of the South by moving to the North was dashed by housing discrimination, voter intimidation, job discrimination, and random acts of violence.

Specific Events

- You should be familiar with the Great Migration. Beginning at the start of the First World War, the Great Migration saw a swell of African American migrants moving to northern cities until the Great Depression, though some historians document the event as lasting through the 1960s (in reality, the migration appears to have occurred in a couple of waves). While fewer than 10% of African Americans lived in the North in the first decade of the 20th century, the onset of World War I saw migrants moving to northern cities for manufacturing job opportunities created by the war effort.
- The Harlem Renaissance was a flowering of Black culture and art. Located in New York City, writers and artists such as Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, and Louis Armstrong created an artistic “rebirth” that coincided with the Great Migration. The hope was that this movement would create social and economic opportunities for northern Black people. The reality was more complex—Duke Ellington, star musician on the stage of the Cotton Club, was not allowed to sit in the audience due to the club’s policy of racial discrimination.
- The landmark case Brown v. Board of Education prohibited discrimination in school, presumably creating equal opportunities for children of all races. The implementation of this ruling caused much difficulty, with some schools openly defying the Court ruling in the South. In the North, school integration was promoted through a process known as “bussing,” allowing students in the inner city to attend schools in white neighborhoods. This program was met with resistance in white communities, including a riot in Boston in the 1970s.
- The Civil Rights Acts (1964, 1965, and 1968) created a de jure equality for African Americans. No longer would Jim Crow laws stand in the way of a person’s access to public accommodations. More significant to northern Black people, who were less likely to face Jim Crow laws, was the 1968 legislation that prohibited housing discrimination.
- In response to integrated schools and the new housing equality, white people left cities for the suburbs in a phenomenon sociologists call “white flight.” This created a de facto segregation in schools and neighborhoods and also affected property values.
- By the 1960s, African Americans continued to face poverty at disproportional rates. The plans of Lyndon Johnson’s Great Society attempted to combat poverty and create opportunity. Some of these programs included the Economic Opportunity Act, Head Start, Upward Bound, Job Corps, VISTA, and the Department of Housing and Urban Development.
- Black nationalism and Black pride movements saw urban African Americans look to provide for their communities through education, food programs, healthcare, and dozens of initiatives carried out by the Black Panthers.

Choosing a Side

The first thing you want to do is to decide what kind of a statement you are going to make. You have already brainstormed all your outside information, made some notes, and decided where to plug in the documents. Because there is no right way to answer this, and many ways to make your argument, here are some positions you might want to argue.

- Since the end of the Civil War, African Americans have always been more mobile than white people, tending to follow economic opportunities and seeking homes in communities where they believed they could safely and independently.
- African American migration in the past 20 years represents a radical departure from the migrations of the 20th century, since African Americans are moving from north to south. According to Document 5, they tend to be better educated than their migrant predecessors. You can infer that this shift may represent a different perception regarding racism and geography.
- Northern economies have become hostile to the needs of African Americans (high levels of unemployment, high cost of living, urban racial tensions), while the South is now more embracing (a growth in manufacturing, historically Black communities and colleges, less disparity in the quality of public schools).

Planning Your Essay

Unless you read extremely quickly, you probably won't have time to write a detailed outline for your essay during the 15-minute reading period. However, it is worth taking several minutes to jot down a loose structure of your essay, because it will actually save you time when you write. First, decide on your thesis and write it down in the test booklet. Then, take a few minutes to brainstorm all the points you might put in your essay. Choose the strongest points and number them in the order in which you plan to present them. Lastly, note which documents and outside information you plan to use in conjunction with each point. If you organize before you write, the actual writing process will go much more smoothly. More importantly, you will not write yourself into a corner, and suddenly find yourself making a point you cannot support or heading toward a weak conclusion (or worse still, no conclusion at all).

What You Should Have Discussed

Regardless of which thesis you choose, your essay should discuss all of the following:

- Since the prompt asks you to analyze “change and continuity,” you should note that the regions of the country affected by the Great Migration have remained fairly constant: the urban Northeast, Great Lakes region, and California.
- The reasons for migration have always revolved around economic and social concerns.
- The “change” has been in the direction of migration: only recently have African Americans been moving south instead of north.
- Document 5 suggests that the new migrants are better educated and placed within the economy compared with their sharecropping ancestors.
- Regardless of time period or motivation, African Americans have tended to migrate to certain areas rather than dispersing evenly throughout the country (no major changes in parts of the rural Midwest, Plains, Rocky Mountains, northern New England, Alaska).
- Racial tensions are highest in areas affected by migration.
- Migration slowed after the 1960s.

SECTION II: THE LONG ESSAY QUESTION

Your task here is to choose ONE of the prompts and present a historically defensible thesis backed up with relevant evidence. For each of the prompts, your thesis is likely to either make the case that the Seven Years' War did or did not contribute to the Revolution, that the Mexican–American War did or did not contribute to the Civil War, OR that World War I did or did not contribute to the Red Scare. Saying that these events did contribute to their respective wars is likely to be the easier position for most students taking this test, although it would be possible to qualify this position with relevant exceptions.

Question 2

If your thesis maintains that the Seven Years' War did largely contribute to the Revolution, you may have mentioned some of the following:

- British debt following the Seven Years' War directly led to heavier taxation of the colonies (e.g., Sugar Act, Stamp Act).
- The heavier taxation that followed the Seven Years' War affected the wealthy, elite colonists who later provided the structure and organization to launch the Revolution. The Founding Fathers were plantation owners and merchants whose interests were directly tied to the changes wrought by the Seven Years' War.
- The Albany Plan of Union proved to colonists that they were capable of organizing for a common cause.
- The Proclamation of 1763 was issued after Britain's victory in the Seven Years' War. It forbade all settlement west of the Appalachian Mountains. Any previously issued land grants were now worthless, thus angering American colonists and leading to a spirit of revolution.
- Before the Seven Years' War, colonists were largely self-sufficient, running their own affairs through local governments and militias. After the War, the British took a more active role in governing and policing the colonies, leading to such incidents as the Boston Massacre, the revocation of the charter of Massachusetts, and quartering of soldiers. This led to colonial discontent and eventual revolution.
- France may have been more inclined to help the colonists during the Revolution as revenge for its prior losses during the Seven Years' War.
- Despite its victory, Britain was weakened financially by the War, possibly leading to an increased boldness on the part of colonists who saw Britain as vulnerable.

If your thesis maintains that the Seven Years' War did not contribute much to the start of the Revolution, you may have mentioned some of the following:

- Life did not change significantly for the masses of poor and middle-class colonists who later went on to form the backbone of the Continental Army. Especially those living in southern colonies would have been indifferent to the effects of the Seven Years' War.
 - Taxation and regulation of trade existed before the Seven Years' War.
 - It was really the shift from salutary neglect to tighter control that prompted independence, not the Seven Years' War itself.
 - The true impetus for revolution was philosophical: republicanism, natural rights, the Enlightenment, Hobbes, Locke, perhaps even the First Great Awakening.
 - Mercantilism had become unduly burdensome and had existed long before the Seven Years' War.
 - Colonists were largely British, thus culturally tied to the Motherland, and saw themselves as dependent on Britain economically.
 - The Seven Years' War demonstrated to colonists that they needed the protection of a strong military power.
 - There were always Loyalists who resisted the notion of pursuing independence from the Crown.
- The Seven Years' War had no effect on the sentiments of those disinclined to the Revolution.

Question 3

If your thesis maintains that the Mexican–American War did do much to launch the Civil War, you may have mentioned some of the following:

- The lands acquired under the Mexican Cession were fertile and viable for cotton production, thus leading to the possible need for slave labor.
- The Civil War was inextricably linked to debates about slavery. The Mexican–American War gave the United States access and control to new territories that would later seek statehood. Whether these territories and states would have legal slavery became the most hotly debated issue in Congress at this time.
- “Popular sovereignty” was cited by many as the easiest way to settle the free-state/slave-state conundrum. Most dramatically in the case of the Kansas-Nebraska Act, popular sovereignty tacitly assumed the rights of particular localities to determine their own destinies, thus contributing to notions of secession on the part of disgruntled southern states.
- Southern Democrats had explicitly supported the war for the express purpose of expanding slavery (a jab in the eye to northern Whigs).

If your thesis maintains that the Mexican–American War did not contribute significantly to the Civil War, you may have mentioned some of the following:

- The slave-state/free-state debate existed long before the Mexican–American War, at least as far back as the Missouri Compromise.
- The Compromise of 1850 was, in fact, “the straw that broke the [southern] camel’s back,” not the Mexican–American War. In other words, it was the way the Mexican Cession was handled that enhanced tensions between North and South, not the war itself.
- Slavery was already a highly controversial issue well before the Mexican–American War. William Lloyd Garrison published “The Liberator” as early as 1831.
- The gag rule prevented Congress from settling the issue of slavery by legislative (peaceful) means.
- Fugitive slave laws and Dred Scott v. Sandford did more to heighten tensions over slavery than merely the acquisition of new territories.
- The Civil War also revolved around issues of states’ rights and the uses of nullification, issues that reared their heads under President Andrew Jackson and were unconnected to slavery, per se.

About the Structure of Your Essay

As you compose your essay, you want to stay focused on cause and effect. Therefore, the analysis of the earlier event has to come back to your claim about whether or not that event was a factor leading to the latter event. An effective way to do this would be to include a component from each event in a particular body paragraph and flesh out the link (or lack thereof) between the two. Remember you are not just listing facts but also directly addressing the cause-and-effect question.

Question 4

Your task in this essay is an analysis of both World War I and the Red Scare, a frenzied time in which government officials searched for Communists within the United States, in order to establish the connection between the two. Due to the contemporaneous nature of the time period (U.S. involvement in World War I lasted from 1917 until 1918, and the first Red Scare lasted from 1917 until 1920), the connections may seem obvious. However, you need to be careful to not just list events that may have happened concurrently. Rather, you should establish a link between the two to best highlight the cause-and-effect relationship. World War I, which the United States entered reluctantly several years after Europe commenced fighting, not only created a wave of anti-German hysteria in the United States, but also fears of communism. Russia, after all, had withdrawn from the war due to the chaotic communist revolution happening on its home front.

Begin your essay with a short overview of the two events mentioned in the prompt. Make sure that you quickly move the discussion into a clear claim about the relationship between the First World War and the first Red Scare. You can, of course, claim that the wheels of the Red Scare were set in motion before World War I began, but you will find rich opportunities for connections between the two events, as well.

Things you may want to mention about World War I:

- Isolationist foreign policy characterized the Wilson administration.
- German submarine attacks killed American citizens, fomenting an anti-German sentiment in the United States.
- Eugene V. Debs was imprisoned for his opposition to the war. His arrest highlights the connection between Socialist political activity and opposition to the war.
- The Espionage Act prevented anyone from using the U.S. mail system to interfere with the war effort or with the draft. The act helped stoke a suspicion that would become a normal part of American life during the Red Scare.
- The Sedition Act furthered that suspicion by making it illegal to try to prevent the sale of war bonds or to speak disparagingly of the government, the flag, the military, or the Constitution.
- Schenck v. United States was a Supreme Court case that challenged the constitutionality of the Espionage Act. Schenck was a prominent socialist and ardent critic of American capitalism, who was arrested and convicted when he printed and mailed leaflets urging men to resist the draft. The Court upheld the Espionage Act.

Give yourself extra points for mentioning the following:

- The government helped create this frenzied atmosphere through its wartime propaganda arm, the Committee on Public Information. Germans were portrayed as bloodthirsty and decidedly anti-American.
- Anti-German sentiment progressed during the war. Violence persisted against German immigrants. Schools largely stopped teaching the German language, while streets with German names changed their signs. Even innocuous references to German culture were rejected: sauerkraut became “liberty cabbage.”

Things you might want to mention about the Red Scare:

- One fear of communism in the United States was how it would impact the war effort: the Russian Revolution forced the nation's withdrawal from World War I in order to deal with matters on the home front.
- The Bolshevik control of Russia created tensions among U.S. government officials about what would happen in the United States if a popular communist movement gained steam.
- Federal and local governments held deep suspicions against union activities. Closely associated with Marxist ideas, organizations of laborers also fell victim due to xenophobia: many members were German and Russian. This period saw business assume greater power, while unions lost power.
- The Federal Bureau of Investigation, headed by J. Edgar Hoover, was created to keep radicals at bay.
- The Palmer Raids saw the government and its agents raid union halls, pool halls, social clubs, and residences. Over 10,000 union members were arrested in over 30 cities, but very few weapons or bombs were found. About 500 immigrants were eventually deported at the conclusion of the Palmer Raids.

Give yourself extra points for mentioning the following:

- The Progressive Party, a one-time advocate for unions, had begun to split between left wing and moderates over the war and the Red Scare.
- Sacco and Vanzetti's sham trial stands as an illustration of the anti-immigrant and anti-union sentiment of the late 1910s and early 1920s. The Red Scare, like the anti-German sentiment during World War I, was kept alive through widespread xenophobia.
- The Emergency Quota Act also shows the influence of xenophobia on federal policy. The quotas discriminated against the "new immigrants" who came from Southern and Eastern Europe—hotbeds for socialist activity.

About the Structure of Your Essay

The task on this question is to find a cause-and-effect relationship between two events that happened nearly simultaneously. For your claim, make it clear in your introductory paragraph whether the feelings of World War I led to the Red Scare, or the two events happened concurrently due to common factors in each. No matter what you argue, to tackle the body paragraphs, look for undercurrents that were common to both events. There seems to be plenty of opportunity to discuss how xenophobia played into both events. Further, a distrust of Socialists could be the topic of another body paragraph. Be consistently deliberate with your analysis as you explain whether the relationships between the events are parallel occurrences or cause and effect.
