SECTION I, PART A: MULTIPLE-CHOICE QUESTIONS

Questions 1–4

When Europeans encountered the New World, the land that was to become the United States was settled by several major powers. According to the map, Spain and France settled large tracts of land. The East Coast was primarily settled by the English, along with smaller regions that were claimed by the Dutch and Swedes. The English eventually took over much of the seaboard, creating the British Colonies in the New World, while the French maintained influence in what would become Canada, as well as down the Mississippi River. The Spanish had already settled South and Central America, and so they would be the first European power to go into what would become the American Southwest.

1. B The primary motives for the Spanish conquest of the New World were global dominance, wealth, and Christian conversion. Choice (B) is best because missions were set up through the American Southwest and West coast to convert the Native populations, and towns began to grow around these missions.
2. D Jamestown attracted new residents due to a labor shortage—the tobacco industry created many opportunities for work and the Virginia Company’s headright system offered land to any settlers willing to move to Jamestown. Choice (D) is correct. Since there was so much work available, (A) is incorrect. The tobacco industry was actually one of the factors that accelerated the need for slavery, so eliminate (B). Choice (C) is incorrect because the indentured servitude system, while harsh, attracted over 100,000 settlers to the Chesapeake region.
3. D In the 1600s, the largest European settlements in North America came from the Spanish, French, Dutch, and English (as seen on the map). None of the European powers had large settlement outposts in the Great Plains; eliminate (A). The Mississippi River Valley settlements are largely dominated by the French, who often intermarried with and secured alliances alongside Native Americans; eliminate (B). The Great Lakes Region is similarly French dominated: eliminate (C). Choice (D) is the correct answer because New England was dominated mostly by British settlers who had little interest in living alongside Native Americans, mostly relying on taking land through war.
4. B Looking at the French regions of the map, it is apparent that French explorers stayed close to the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes before going directly down the Mississippi River. Choice (B) is correct. Eliminate (A) because it was the British, not the French, who settled most of the coast. While some of the French region was in a cooler climate, their settlements stretched all the way down to New Orleans, which is not a cold climate. Eliminate (C). “Exclusively” is too strong a word in (D). The French settled some mountainous regions in Western Pennsylvania, making this choice incorrect.

Questions 5–6

The “Middle Passage” was part of the Triangular Trade system that transported slave ships among Europe, Africa, and the Americas. This section went from Africa to the Western Hemisphere, and was heavily used for the slave trade. Conditions on board the slave ships were inhumane and lethal. Many slaves died en route. In this passage, former slave Olaudah Equiano describes in great detail the journey experienced by many slaves before the slave trade was outlawed in the United States in 1807.

5. A The author here describes the horrors of the Middle Passage. The source is focused on the slave trade, a message the American audience would be more receptive to than a broad indictment of the slave trade itself. While there was a movement to repatriate slaves to Africa with the American Colonization Society, that’s not as directly connected to this source; eliminate (B). The spread of slavery further west was a major controversy, but not one addressed by Equiano; eliminate (C). The 3/5 Compromise over representation was part of the Constitution that preceded 1800; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is the correct answer because the federal government did ban the international slave trade in 1808.
6. D “Improvident” means thoughtless or not well planned. “Avarice” is greed. Therefore, when Equiano describes “improvident avarice,” he means thoughtless greed. This seems to be a characteristic attributed to those involved in the slave trade. Choice (D) meets this requirement. The South did not transition from an agricultural economy, so (A) is incorrect. Rice plantations, particularly in South Carolina, were quite profitable, which enhanced the need for plantation owners to purchase slaves. Eliminate (B). Choice (C) is incorrect because Native Americans did not travel the Middle Passage as part of the slave trade.

Questions 7–9

This excerpt comes from Patrick Henry’s famous “Give Me Liberty or Give Me Death” speech. Henry was a radical Virginian who advocated self-rule for the colonists, coauthoring the Virginia Stamp Act Resolves to protest that particular tax. In this passage, Henry expresses his frustration at getting no results from petitioning England for relief from unfair taxation. His warnings are ominous, as he predicts an on-coming storm, which would come in the form of the Revolutionary War.

7. C In this source, Patrick Henry calls for stronger action against the British. Even though there were many who chose to remain loyal by the time the Revolution began, Henry’s source tells us little about that perspective; eliminate (A). Henry himself might be calling for revolution, but that tells us nothing about how the rest of the colonists feel; eliminate (B). While Henry refers to Parliament as “tyrannical,” we can’t know if the king feels the same way (but we can likely infer he doesn’t); eliminate (D). Choice (C) is the best answer because Henry is clearly unsatisfied that Britain has offered the colonists anything meaningful in return for continued support of the British empire.
8. B Henry contends that the colonists have used every measure possible, short of violence, to petition the British Parliament and the king. A rejected application for tax exemptions would be evidence of petition that went unrecognized. Choice (B) is correct. While diary entries would show that Henry’s perspective was a common one in the colonies, it would not show evidence of petition or remonstrance. Choice (A) is incorrect. Similarly, speeches and purchases made without paying taxes show opposition to British rule, but do not actively petition for change. Eliminate (C) and (D).

9. C All of the above answer choices represent outcomes of the revolution, but only one is relevant to Henry's attitude in the excerpt. Henry's attitude generally is that the will of the people is being ignored, so strict property qualifications for voting would likely be controversial among people who share his attitude; (A) is incorrect. While the colonists were upset with Britain about limitations on their rights to settle westward, that's not as relevant to Henry's complaint in the excerpt which is more about taxation; eliminate (B). Women did play a crucial role in the revolution, but this is not a perspective Henry is concerned with here; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is the correct answer because people like Henry sought to create a limited government with the Articles of Confederation.

Questions 10–13

As the Washington's Secretary of the Treasury, Hamilton was tasked with carving out the duties of his position. His most important idea in this role was the national bank. In this excerpt, Hamilton cites both public and private sector reasons for a national bank. George Washington ultimately signed the bill to establish the bank, but not after much deliberation. Washington's Secretary of State, Thomas Jefferson, opposed the bank, as he claimed there was nothing in the Constitution that gave authority to the federal government to create a national bank. Hamilton, on the other hand, was a broad constructionist and claimed the power to coin money along with the Necessary and Proper clause that gave the government an implied power to establish the national bank.

10. C Hamilton states that "the tendency of a national bank is to increase public and private credit." Look for an answer that shows how banks benefit both the public (via government) and the private sector (via business). Choice (C) does just that. While Hamilton was able to help the United States pay off its Revolutionary War debt, that was not mentioned as the primary purpose of a national bank. Eliminate (A). Banks do not regulate commerce (that is the function of Congress, according to the Constitution). Choice (B) is incorrect. Hamilton's excerpt does not state any guarantees that recessions would not occur. Eliminate (D).
11. B In the excerpt, Hamilton talks about the importance of a national bank in supporting industrial growth. Henry Clay's American System in the 1820s directly built off of Hamilton's influence from the prior era; eliminate (A). The Progressive Movement saw the creation of the Federal Reserve, the central bank we still have today; eliminate (C). During the New Deal, FDR enacted several reforms that gave the government more power over the country's banking system to support the same goals Hamilton alludes to in the passage; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is the correct answer because in the 1830s, the Democratic party was led by Andrew Jackson who sought to kill the national bank.
12. B Since the power for the federal government to establish a bank is not explicitly written in the Constitution, the proposal was controversial. A larger debate began (and continues today) about whether the Constitution should be interpreted strictly or broadly. Therefore (B) is the correct choice. There was not any question about the validity of the debt and Hamilton wanted to establish the bank in part to address the debt issue. Eliminate (A). The power to coin money was in question, not the Commerce Clause. Eliminate (C). Even though Secretary of State Thomas Jefferson was heavily involved in the debate, this was not about his department. Eliminate (D).
13. D Hamilton claimed that a national bank could support businesses through private credit. Evidence that businesses could successfully pay back those loans would ease some concerns about the wisdom of establishing a national bank. Choice (D) does just that. Transcripts of the debate would not necessarily only support Hamilton's case, so eliminate (A). Plans to pay off the federal debt are not directly related to the issue of private credit, so (B) is incorrect. Bank statements do not show evidence of the necessity of a national bank in the same way that records of successfully repaid business loans would. Eliminate (C).

Questions 14–18

While the French and English were engaged in a naval war with one another at the dawn of the nineteenth century, they established blockades that consequently kept American ships away from Europe. After American ships were attacked, Jefferson decided to put his foot down and, in this excerpt, request an embargo—no foreign trade was to happen under this policy. The law passed and, as you can imagine, did not bode well for American business. Illicit trade continued despite the legislation. Congress eased up on the embargo with the Non-Intercourse Act of 1809, but the United States was ultimately on course to settle the matter in the War of 1812.

14. C France itself sold the Louisiana Territory to the United States among little opposition from the other European countries; eliminate (A). The Monroe Doctrine had yet to be announced when this source was created; eliminate (B). The Barbary Wars did occur during Jefferson's presidency, but that was off the coast of Africa, not Europe as alluded to in the passage; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is the correct answer because Jefferson is directly reacting to conflicts between Britain and France that sought to put the United States in the middle of them.
15. A This excerpt represents Jefferson's desire to keep the United States neutral in conflicts between Britain and France. After World War I, the United States Congress rejected the Versailles Treaty because of the League of Nations, which it feared would further entangle Americans in European affairs; eliminate (B). The Monroe Doctrine warned European powers to keep their business out of America, consistent with Jefferson's principles here; eliminate (C). Washington's policy of neutrality sought to strike a balance between French and English influence in the 1790s; eliminate (D). A is the best answer because rather than eschew European alliances after World War II, the United States cultivated them in an effort to combat the threat of communism.
16. C Jefferson spent most of his time in office trying to shrink the size of the army and cut government spending; the War of 1812 would not happen for several years after this letter was written (when Madison was president); eliminate (A). Though Jefferson had been a supporter of the French Revolution, by this time Europe was fighting the Napoleonic Wars, which Jefferson sought to avoid; eliminate (B). Jefferson was not known for supporting tax increases; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is the best answer because Jefferson is describing a policy of an embargo in order to prevent American ships from being attacked on the high seas.
17. C An embargo prevents businesses from engaging in foreign trade. This had a significant negative impact on large business centers. New England (a shipping hub) was his especially hard and many businesses continued to engage in foreign trade via Canada. Choice (C) is correct. Urban dwellers depended on the health of the business community for their own survival, so (A) would not be true. Even rural farmers were affected—limiting their potential crop purchasers is not going to prove helpful. Eliminate (B). Since Southern plantation owners were less dependent on shipping than northern manufacturing towns, the South was less affected than New England. Choice (D) is incorrect.
18. D In the coming years, the economic standoff hit a boiling point and Congress declared war on Great Britain in 1812. Choice (D) is correct. The war hurt the Federalist Party, who were seen as weak for opposing it. Eliminate (A). As the embargo led to war, it cannot be said that it improved relations with Europe at the time. Choice (B) is incorrect. American manufacturing actually increased with the embargo since the United States had to depend on its own businesses for all of its needs. Eliminate (C).

Questions 19–21

This painting depicts one of the greatest engineering feats of the nineteenth century—the Erie Canal. Connecting Lake Erie to the Hudson River, the canal allowed ships to travel from the Great Lakes (and therefore the upper Midwest) to New York City (and therefore the Atlantic Ocean). Midwestern farmers could sell their goods internationally and the northeastern cities stood as the hub of international trade. Usage of the canal was such that its dimensions were increased to accommodate the overwhelming traffic.

19. B The photo shows a boat traveling along the Erie Canal, which linked coastal New York to the Great Lakes region. In the early 1800s, several Supreme Court decisions such as Dartmouth v. Woodward and Fletcher v. Peck bolstered contract and property rights, a key development in the growth of the Market Revolution; eliminate (A). Steam engines powered steamships, which became common along the Erie Canal; eliminate (C). Textile manufacturers relied on canals like the Erie Canal to ship many of their goods; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because the Erie Canal was developed with state money from New York, not the federal government (the federal government would not play a large role in supporting transportation until after the Civil War).
20. C The Erie Canal connected New York by waterway to the Great Lakes. The Pacific Coast (where California is) was at this time still controlled by Spain (and later Mexico) in this period; eliminate (A). Southeastern states such as South Carolina would have more than likely shipped cotton directly from ports like Charleston to New York rather than relying on rivers or lakes; eliminate (B). The Southwest was also controlled by Spain/Mexico at this time; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is the correct answer because the Midwest relied on the Great Lakes and Mississippi River for trade, which the Erie Canal helped link more directly.
21. B The painting shows the Erie Canal against the backdrop of a small village and the rolling plains behind it. Art that celebrated patriotic ideals and national identity tended to be associated with the revolutionary era immediately before this; eliminate (A). Art and literature expressing ethnic and regional identities is more associated with the 1920s (such as the proliferation of jazz); eliminate (C). The growth of mass culture is more of a postwar phenomenon (seen in TV shows like I Love Lucy); eliminate (D). Choice (B) is the best answer because this painting is reflective of themes seen in art from movements like the Hudson River school.

Questions 22–25

William Lloyd Garrison's The Liberator was a radical anti-slavery newspaper. In its first issue, Garrison apologizes for his earlier moderate opposition to slavery. For Immediatists such as Garrison, simply opposing slavery was not enough. One must also oppose the gradual cessation of slavery and fight for immediate abolition. The paper was banned in certain places around the United States, but not before reigniting the debate over the morality of slavery, which had been left behind at the Constitutional Convention. The Liberator inspired other abolitionist papers, notably Frederick Douglass' The North Star.

22. D The excerpt is from the inaugural issue of William Lloyd Garrison's The Liberator, an abolitionist newspaper. Slave owners would likely not be responsive to a message like this; eliminate (A). Irish immigrants in New York were generally working class and had little connection to the formal abolitionist movement; eliminate (B). Slaves living on plantations in places like Alabama were often not taught to read and many would have been unlikely to be able to read a publication like this; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is the correct answer because Boston was a huge hub for abolitionist activity and Garrison sought to recruit white northerners to support this political cause.

23. D In the years following the publication of The Liberator, Congressional debate on the issue of slavery became heated to the point that a gag rule was issued and debate banned from the floor. Therefore, (D) is correct, and (A) and (C) are incorrect. Along with banning discussion of slavery, the gag rule prevented further legislation on slavery. Eliminate (B).
24. D Supporters of the point of view shown here were abolitionists, who wanted an immediate and full end to slavery. Abolitionists and feminists worked closely in this period such as through the Seneca Falls Convention; eliminate (A). Northern abolitionists also were key parts of the underground railroad and organized to protect slaves against bounty hunters who sought to return them South; eliminate (B). While not common, some abolitionists such as John Brown supported violence against slave owners in incidents like Bleeding Kansas and the raid at Harpers Ferry; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is the correct answer because abolitionists were categorically different from Free Soil Party, who were more interested in protecting white labor than protecting the rights of slaves.
25. B From 1800 to 1848, reform movements became common for a variety of reasons. The Market Revolution did lead many to question their relationship to labor (especially the transcendentalists), but people like Garrison were focused more on slave labor, not on those earning wages; eliminate (A). Voluntary organizations did form, but these were focused on addressing behaviors considered “sinful” such as drinking alcohol; eliminate (C). White men without land did grow more politically powerful, but that is not as directly broached in the source; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is the correct answer because Garrison discusses having given a speech in a church and implicitly suggests that the struggle against slavery is one rooted in his relationship to God.

Questions 26–30

Abraham Lincoln never saw the South’s secession from the Union as legitimate. He therefore did not want the process of Reconstruction to drag on more than it needed to. Even before the end of the Civil War, Lincoln expresses mercy for the Confederate States. In this excerpt, President Lincoln offers a simple way for the southern States to reenter the Union: ten percent of voters must pledge loyalty to the United States. Hence, Lincoln’s plan was known as the Ten Percent Plan. The Radical Republicans in Congress did not share Lincoln’s appeal to mercy. They proposed the Wade-Davis bill, which called for a majority of voters to pledge loyalty before a state could be readmitted.

26. A Abraham Lincoln wanted to make it easy for the Confederate states to reenter the Union. This was his solution to the question of how to move forward. After all, the Constitution did not specify how states in rebellion may rejoin the United States, so controversy arose over how to treat the southern states. The correct answer is (A). Lincoln does not mention surrender in this excerpt, so eliminate (B). This also is not a discussion on western territories, so (C) is incorrect. Since this speech is made in the middle of the Civil War answer the question in (D) had already been answer. Eliminate it.
27. D In this excerpt, Lincoln is laying out his 10% plan for how to readmit states into the Union. While never formally implemented, it does reflect major debates that happened during Reconstruction. Lincoln never mentions slavery in this excerpt here, even though southern states were compelled to adopt the 13th Amendment; eliminate (A). The women’s rights movement did grow divided over amendments like the 14th and 15th, but that did not happen for several years after this proclamation; eliminate (B). Formerly enslaved people did gain new leadership roles in Congress, but again, Lincoln never mentions slavery here; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is the correct answer because Lincoln’s proposal reflects the federal government more strongly dictating how the Confederate states would need to re-establish their governments (in a “republican” form, referring to a democratic ideal and not the political party), and this would shape much of the debate over Reconstruction.

28. A The southern states left the Union in an unprecedented act. President Lincoln and the members of his party in Congress (known as Radical Republicans) disagreed over what should be done about those states at the end of the Civil War. The president wanted a smooth process to reintegrate those states, while the Radical Republicans wanted to punish them. The correct answer is therefore (A). The slavery question was settled with the passage of the 13th Amendment at the end of the war. Eliminate (B). Funding for Reconstruction was not much of a debate between Congress and Lincoln, as Lincoln was killed before the process of Reconstruction began. Eliminate (C). Choice (D) is incorrect because voting rights was also an issue that was not dealt with until after the war (and Lincoln's death), with the passage of the 15th Amendment.
29. B In this excerpt, Lincoln is laying out conditions for the Southern states to be re-admitted to the Union, but also refers to their secession as "so-called," implying he doesn't believe it was ever legal to begin with. The Declaration of Independence said little about the relationship between the states and federal government, proclaiming only the creation of a new country separate from Britain; eliminate (A). The Constitution did more clearly establish a framework for the federal and state governments, but still held that the federal government was supreme over the state ones; eliminate (C). The Federalist Papers were written to encourage elected officials to support a stronger national government at the expense of state government power; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is the correct answer because the Articles of Confederation established a government where power was held mostly by individual state governments, a strong contrast with the power the federal government is claiming here.
30. A Lincoln offered this policy in 1863, about a year and a half before the war ended. Southern Plantation owners at that point would have had no interest in submitting to Lincoln's authority; eliminate (B). Radical Republicans in Congress felt that Lincoln was being far too lenient; eliminate (C). At this point, the Confederacy had little interest in surrendering; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is the correct answer because Lincoln's policy here is particularly moderate, and border states such as Tennessee and Missouri were the ones Lincoln often sought to please as he balanced the demands of abolitionists against the prosecution of the Civil War.

Questions 31–33

Following America's late nineteenth century Industrial Revolution, some of the most profitable businesses consolidated and bought up smaller rivals in order to limit competition. This created monopolies, which often drove up prices at the expense of the consumer. Americans called on Congress to fix this problem and out of their appeals came the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890. However, the cynicism of this cartoon indicates that the law was not as tough as it could be, with Senators heavily influenced by corporate dollars to ensure such a law had no teeth to it. It took another generation until a more effective anti-monopoly law (the Clayton Antitrust Act) took hold.

31. C The "bosses" watching over the senators are labeled with the names of different "trusts." A trust is another word for a monopoly. Therefore, the central issue here is monopolies. Choice (C) is correct. The purpose of the cartoon is that business leaders can tell the senators what to do (they are the "bosses" of the Senate after all), so (A) and (D) are incorrect because they have the situation backwards. There is no reference to political campaigns in this image, so (B) is incorrect.
32. A The cartoonist is expressing a negative point of view toward "monopolists," depicting industrial tycoons as having inordinate say in the running of Congress. The point of view is likely more sympathetic to that of organized labor relative to capitalist bosses, so they would probably favor the rights of labor unions to organize; eliminate (B). Laissez-faire economic policies are those that largely allow businesses to govern themselves, which this cartoonist would likely not favor; eliminate (C). Many organized laborers were fearful that foreign immigration reduced their wages; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is the correct answer because groups such as the Populists called on the government to reduce the power of capitalists through increased regulation by the government and the introduction of income taxes.

33. B The cartoonist is highlighting a political economic time period when the government minimally regulated businesses (also known as laissez faire economics). The Roaring 20s were known for their reductions in business and income taxes; eliminate (A). The Reagan Revolution was built on reducing the size of the federal government; eliminate (C). In the 1990s, Bill Clinton embraced many aspects of Reagan's economic philosophy through deregulation of industries such as telecommunications; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is the correct answer because during the Great Depression, FDR's New Deal embraced strong regulation of businesses

Naturalist John Muir explored the immense redwood forests and sprawling natural landscapes of the West, recording the majesty of what he saw in his journals. He championed the protection of American forests and forged a friendship with Theodore Roosevelt. Inspired by Muir's writings, as well as his own exploration of the American wilderness, Roosevelt fought for the Antiquities Act. After he signed it into law, Roosevelt went on to protect more United States land than any other president up to that point. In this excerpt, Muir explains that the federal government can be the most effective protector of American land.

34. D The final line—"only Uncle Sam can do that"—shows that Muir sees the federal government as key to protecting the American wilderness. Choice (D) is correct. Uncle Sam is not a symbol for local government or businesses, so eliminate (A) and (B). Even though John Muir founded the Sierra Club, he did not depend on non-profits to do all the work involved in preserving the natural world. Eliminate (C).
35. B Muir's relationship with Theodore Roosevelt inspired Roosevelt to protect more land than any other president had until that point. Choice (B) is correct. The focus on preserving the natural world was part of the Progressive Movement's goals, so eliminate (A). Green energy sources were not quite en vogue yet, so (C) is incorrect. Finally, the purpose of Muir's pursuits were to preserve the wilderness from industrial use. Eliminate (D).
36. C The author is calling for the federal government to take a stronger role in the protection of America's environment. The creation of the EPA is a natural outgrowth of this idea; eliminate (A). The Clean Air Act similarly represents a federal effort to mitigate environmental damage; eliminate (B). The Department of Energy, while concerned in many ways with oil and nuclear policy, was created in the 1970s to President Carter to encourage the development of alternative sources of energy besides fossil fuels, likely in keeping with the author's argument; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because the deregulation of the natural gas industry was a Reagan administration policy to lower the cost of energy that was bemoaned by environmental activists.

These graphs highlight the extent of President Taft’s Dollar Diplomacy—the use of American power to influence policy in other nations. It is clear that the brunt of American foreign investment went to Latin America. The second graph shows that American businesses were most interested in mining and smelting, while not particularly interested in investing in overseas manufacturing. This indicates that Dollar Diplomacy was fueled by foreign countries’ natural resources that were later manufactured in the United States.

37. D The first graph demonstrates that Latin America, by far, has the most investment coming from the United States. Choice (D) is correct. The graph only gives information on mining and smelting in Latin America, not worldwide. Therefore, it is unknown whether this is the highest investment worldwide. Eliminate (A). Choice (B) is incorrect because it cannot be proven by the information provided (and oil is not even the lowest investment on the second chart). While Asian investments were certainly not the highest, it is too much of a stretch to say “insignificant.” In fact, investments in Latin America and Asia were the driving forces behind Taft’s Dollar Diplomacy. Eliminate (C).
38. B The graph shows heavy investment in Latin America and the Caribbean. The United States had an interest in containing Soviet Communism, but that was not until after World War II, and this data long precedes that; eliminate (A). Choice (C) can be eliminated for the same reason as this data precedes both world wars. While the United States was interested in expanding its influence, its formal colonial holdings paled in comparison to those of Britain and France (the United States relied more on indirect influence than formal conquest); eliminate (D). Choice (B) is the correct answer because the graph shows compelling evidence of Taft’s policy of Dollar Diplomacy.
39. D One discrepancy on the second graph is that investments in mining and smelting are quite large while investments in manufacturing is small. Clearly the United States was more interested in getting raw materials in Latin America than it was in manufacturing them in Latin America. This is because there were plenty of plants in the United States to do so. Choice (D) is correct. Choice (A) is incorrect because public utilities investment is actually higher than manufacturing investments. Since agricultural investment is higher than oil investments, there is no evidence to support the claim in (B). Eliminate it. Manufacturing investments are low, making (C) incorrect.

Questions 40–44

While Woodrow Wilson is credited with forming the Treaty of Versailles from his Fourteen Points, the treaty to end World War I was not actually ratified by the United States. The United States ultimately signed its own peace treaties with the belligerents of World War I a couple years later, but the Treaty of Versailles, which included membership in the League of Nations, was a little too involved in European affairs for Republican senators, namely Henry Cabot Lodge. Lodge transformed his reservations into a series of amendments to the treaty (as depicted in this cartoon). Wilson opposed the amendments and urged his party to vote against Lodge’s version. In the end, the treaty went unratified by the United States, though Wilson won the Nobel Peace Prize for his work in establishing the League of Nations.

40. A In the cartoon Senator Lodge is escorting a battered peace treaty, which in this case is a reference to the Versailles Treaty that ended World War I. By this point, the war already ended, and the draft had come and gone; eliminate (B). Many labor activists were jailed for criticizing US foreign policy during World War I, but that is not Lodge’s concern here; eliminate (C). The United Nations was created after World War II; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is correct because the battle over the Versailles Treaty in Congress highlighted divisions over those who wished to join or reject the League of Nations.

41. A The conflict referenced in the cartoon is the First World War. The United States established bodies like the War Industries Board to increase wartime production; eliminate (B). African Americans began the Great Migration during the First World War that continued for the next several decades; eliminate (C). Political radicals such as socialists were attacked as un-American and gave way to the First Red Scare with the Palmer Raids in 1919; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is the correct answer because the US actually began restricting immigration more as a result of the war, not less.
42. B Ultimately, the Senate could not agree on Lodge's changes to the bill, and it was never ratified. Choice (B) is correct. The problem with (A) is the word "join." While the European powers agreed to the treaty, and Wilson played a large part in negotiating it, the United States did not ratify it. Eliminate (A). The war did not drag on, as the treaty was created following surrender of the Central Powers. Eliminate (C). No European nation was persuaded by Lodge's changes. Choice (D) is incorrect.
43. D Lodge is one of the leading opponents of the Versailles Treaty largely because of the League of Nations and fears that it would obligate the United States to get more involved in European affairs. Washington's Farewell Speech was largely in keeping with some of Lodge's sentiments; eliminate (A). Mercantilism is more associated with Great Britain and the pre-industrial age; eliminate (B). Though the United States had been an imperial power, Lodge's opponents were not disagreeing over which territories to conquer; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is the best answer because an opponent of Lodge would likely support collective security organizations like NATO after the Second World War.
44. C After not ratifying the Treaty of Versailles (and therefore not joining the League of Nations) following World War I, the United States took charge in the process of creating the United Nations after World War II. Choice (C) is correct. Choice (A) is incorrect because the United States did participate in the process of creating the Treaty of Versailles, even if it did not ratify the document. The United States neither hosted the treaty to end World War I (Versailles is in France) and was heavily involved in the process of ending World War II. Eliminate (B). The United States maintained an allegiance with France following World War I. Eliminate (D).

Questions 45–49

The first excerpt is from the self-proclaimed mayor of Hooverville, a Seattle man named Jesse Jackson (not to be confused with the Civil Rights leader). Jackson describes the toughness of folks who were relegated to living in shanty towns due to the hardships of the Great Depression. Jackson also relays how the towns were named in a sarcastic homage to President Hoover. The following excerpt is a letter written by Hoover to the governor of Illinois asking for cooperation in making government funds available to ease the burdens of the Great Depression. Ironically, it was the man who defeated Hoover in the 1932 Election, Franklin Roosevelt, who ultimately gets credit for using the government's resources ("the machinery of the country") to help end the Great Depression.

45. D In the excerpt, Hoover is wrestling with whether or not the federal government ought to help support people in some way in the midst of the Great Depression. While industrialization did create cheaper consumer goods, that's of little benefit to the country's unemployed workers that Hoover is concerned about; eliminate (A). Labor unions had very few protections up to this point in American history; eliminate (B). The US had for several decades sought to control more territories to gain natural resources, but Hoover is not suggesting colonization as a cure to the Depression; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is the correct answer because Hoover's default assumption is that the government should stay out of the Depression, and the federal government would only start playing an active role in the economy after his presidency.

46. C This question asks about causes of the Great Depression. While the United States had spent a lot during the First World War, the 1920s were a decade of relative peace; eliminate (A). The 1920s were known for conservative economic policies of reduced taxes on the wealthy; eliminate (B). Food prices decreased significantly in the 1920s, which caused many farmers to go bankrupt; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is the answer because the instability of the country's financial system was a major driver of the Depression and spurred calls for reform during the New Deal.
47. C The residents of Hoovervilles needed much assistance since jobs were rare in the early years of the Depression. Jackson would likely agree with Hoover's call for government aid to assist during the hard times of the Great Depression. Choice (C) is correct. There is no evidence that Jackson does not believe in the use of government intervention. Eliminate (A). According to his story, Jackson seems highly critical of Hoover's role in the Great Depression, so he would not likely offer support of Hoover's work. Choice (B) is incorrect. Jackson makes no indication that the economic situation has gotten any better. Eliminate (D).
48. A The question is asking about how New Deal programs were most challenge din the 1930s. While labor activists did criticize the New Deal at times for not going far enough, FDR's team often took these criticisms to heart and incorporated them into the Second New Deal (such as the Wagner Act); eliminate (B). Liberal members of Congress were exactly the ones who designed most of the New Deal programs in the first place; eliminate (C). The United States did go to war against Germany and Japan, but not until the 1940s, and this actually stimulated the economy rather than weakening it; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is correct because the Supreme Court struck down many of the New Deal's programs as unconstitutional until FDR was able to begin replacing more of the justices on the bench.
49. B Jackson mentions that the lazy man will not last long in a Hooverville, and Hoover concedes that "destitution" will continue. Choice (B) is correct because both have a negative view of the immediate economic future. This also provides good reason to eliminate (D). There is no discussion of governments investing in shanty towns. Eliminate (A). Neither passage mentions the winter as being the end of Hoovervilles (Hoover does not even mention Hoovervilles). Choice (C) is incorrect.

Questions 50–53

Overshadowed by Martin Luther King's more famous "I Have a Dream" speech, John Lewis' words from the March on Washington echoed many of his mentor's sentiments. This passage focuses on those who complained that the Civil Rights Movement was not gradual enough. Lewis claims that an issue as urgent as discrimination in public business is an urgent problem that must be remedied immediately. Lewis's speech was viewed as quite radical, and he was asked at the last minute to remove a passage critical of the Kennedy Administration's inaction on legal discrimination.

50. B In a similar vein as Martin Luther King's "Letter from a Birmingham Jail," John Lewis speaks about the urgency of demanding civil rights ("We do not want our freedom gradually, but we want to be free now!"). Choice (B) is correct because it contains a group (white Americans) who claim African Americans should wait for their rights. Lewis, a leader in the Civil Rights Movement, would not likely have criticized allies, so (A) and (C) are incorrect. Choice (D) is incorrect because Lewis would also have been critical of the slow pace of the movement.

51. C The March on Washington occurred less than a year before President Lyndon Johnson signed the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Marchers were motivated by their frustrations at discriminatory lunch counters and separate but equal businesses. The March on Washington called for an end to de jure segregation in places of public accommodation. Choice (C) is correct. Housing discrimination would be explicitly confronted later in the decade. Congress would finally pass the Housing Discrimination Act in 1968. Eliminate (A). Public schools had been integrated (in a legal, if not in a de facto sense) with the Brown v. Board of Education decision a decade earlier. Choice (B) is incorrect. The speeches at the March on Washington called upon Americans to practice unity, so black separatism was not a significant part of the event. Eliminate (D).
52. A This speech was given in 1963, shortly before the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. While the country did liberalize its immigration laws in 1965, that was not the purpose of this speech; eliminate (B). The federal government did introduce limited programs of affirmative action, but that was also not a main subject of this speech; eliminate (C). Medicare was an important part of LBJ's Great Society programs, but it was not a main goal for civil rights activists like Lewis; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is the correct answer because this is exactly the description of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.
53. C After 1965, groups like SNCC grew dissatisfied with the perceived slow pace of civil rights reform and in fact changed its name from the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee to the Student National Coordinating Committee (with Kwame Toure taking over from John Lewis). Direct action and nonviolent resistance were both crucial to SNCC's early organizing; eliminate (A). Litigation had been the focus in the 1950s with cases like Brown v. Board of Education; eliminate (B). SNCC was primarily a youth movement and continued to be after 1965; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because many in SNCC were drawn to the idea of Black Power in the later years of the 1960s.

President Obama was elected in November of 2008, becoming the nation's first African-American president. Following nearly a decade of war in Afghanistan and Iraq, and in the throes of an economic recession, Americans seemed ready for a change from the Republican Bush Administration. In his victory speech in Chicago, Obama touched on issues ranging from optimism to bridging the divides that separate the American people.

54. B This excerpt is from the victory speech of Barack Obama, a liberal Democrat who was elected president in 2008. That year, the country was reeling from a major recession, and economic inequality was a major driver of Obama's success; eliminate (A). Obama mentions "promoting the cause of peace," a hot topic during the War on Terror of the 00's; eliminate (B). Obama reaffirms that "out of many, we are one," a nod to the increasing diversity of the country; eliminate (C). Obama also mentions "promoting the cause of peace," a hot topic during the War on Terror of the 00's; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because Obama's election represented a repudiation of conservatism, not an endorsement of it.
55. B Obama gave this speech in 2008 during the Great Recession. The 1920s was generally a prosperous period (save for the beginning of the Depression in 1929); eliminate (A). The 1960s was associated with liberalism thanks to presidents like Kennedy and Johnson, but this was another prosperous time; eliminate (C). The same goes for the 1990s, which saw the tenure of the centrist Bill Clinton; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because the Great Recession was the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression, which brought FDR to power in the 1930s.

SECTION I, PART B: SHORT-ANSWER QUESTIONS

Question 1

The Spanish-American War of 1898 was a hallmark product of President McKinley's expansionist policies. The war's genesis stemmed from a Cuban insurrection against Spain. At first, most Americans wanted to stay out of the conflict (although they supported Cuban independence). But tabloid newspaper accounts of the war, known as "yellow journalism," blatantly falsified stories and photographs of Spanish "atrocities" in Cuba. Such reporting helped turn popular opinion toward intervention. The press' manipulation of public opinion reached a zenith with the sinking of the U.S.S. Maine, a U.S. battleship, anchored in Havana Harbor. An explosion onboard left 260 Americans dead, but the cause or responsible agent was never definitely determined. Despite a distinct lack of evidence implicating Spain, the press "tried and convicted" Spain of bombing the Maine.

McKinley issued a warning and strict conditions to Spain soon after the event. Spain accepted McKinley's terms but Congress had already moved to mobilize for war, and thus, war began. The war itself was relatively brief. The United States was well-armed and won the war with comparatively few casualties. The modern American Navy, led by Commodore Dewey, and the Rough Riders, a cavalry unit, led by Theodore Roosevelt in the Battle of San Juan Hill, distinguished itself. In the end, Spain surrendered all claims to Cuba, which emerged as an independent nation, and the United States acquired Puerto Rico, Guam, and the Philippines.

- A. An effective answer to part (a) will highlight differences between Roosevelt's and Atwood's positions on the Spanish-American war including
- whether the War was wholly selfish on the part of the United States or partially humanitarian
 - whether or not the War accomplished anything useful for the Cuban people
 - whether or not the United States actions were proportionate to the causes
 - whether tobacco and sugar interests were primary or secondary considerations
 - whether or not the United States knew the true story behind the sinking of the Maine
- B. Roosevelt's view is that humanitarian concerns in Cuba outweighed American strategic interests in the region. This question is asking for an event or development to support his view. You could have used one of the following:
- the Monroe Doctrine
 - the Cuba Libre movement based in Florida
 - church support for Cuban independence
 - heavy-handed tactics by the Spanish to quell a Cuban revolt
 - the refusal of the Spanish government to accept negotiations with President McKinley
- C. Atwood's view is that the Spanish-American war was based on lies and propaganda. Lodge's quote seems to suggest that the United States had selfish reasons for wanting war against Spain and was simply waiting for an excuse to strike. This question is asking for an event or development to support his view. You could have used one of the following:
- Joseph Pulitzer's and William Randolph Hearst's used newspapers to gin up anger against Spain ("yellow journalism").
 - Before the Civil War, the South attempted to acquire Cuba to expand slave territory.
 - In 1894, 90% of Cuba's total exports went to the United States.
 - Uncertainty about the future of Cuba harmed American business interests. Sugar merchants lobbied Washington for an end to the instability.

- After the War, the U.S. not only aided Cuba in getting its independence, but also acquired an indefinite lease to Guantanamo Bay (the Platt Amendment), and territorial rights to Guam and the Philippines.

Question 2

Urban governments during the Gilded Age were not like those of today. Most Americans expected churches, private charities, and ethnic communities to provide services for the poor. However, many of those services were provided instead by a group of corrupt men called political bosses. Bosses helped the poor find homes and jobs; they also helped them apply for citizenship and voting rights. They built parks, funded auxiliary police and fire departments, and constructed roads and sewage lines. In return, they expected community members to vote as they were instructed. They also required bribes and kickbacks to help fund community projects. Political bosses—whose organizations were called political machines—rendered services that communities would not otherwise have received. However, because the bosses resorted to criminal means to accomplish their goals, the cost of their services was high.

The most notorious of these bosses was “Boss” Tweed in New York City. He embezzled millions of dollars through corruption in city construction projects. Tweed also became a prominent leader of Tammany Hall, the political machine of New York’s Democratic Party. Tweed gave out jobs, homes, and protection to new immigrants in exchange for their votes in local elections. One estimate claimed that Tweed charged the city of New York almost $180,000 ($2.5 million today) for three tables and forty chairs, and that one worker earned over $130,000 ($1.8 million today) for two days’ work. Tweed was eventually found guilty and died in prison in 1878.

Beginning in the 1870s, Tweed’s power became noticeable to leading journalists, including cartoonists. In this later cartoon, we see the “Tammany Tiger” injured and being pursued by “hunters” such as national democracy, New York State government, and reformers of various stripes. The year is 1893, so this is after the death of Boss Tweed, and Tammany Hall is becoming weaker in its influence.

A. An effective answer to part (a) will include discussions of the corruptions of urban governments including:

- Bribery
- Vote-buying
- Dishonest elections
- Ties to organized crime
- Use of immigrant populations to garner support

B and C—Effective answers to parts (b) and (c) will include reforms of the corruptions of urban governments including:

- Political bosses tended to lose power in times of economic depression, such as during the 1890s and 1930s
- Reformers tended to be middle-class and educated, while political bosses gathered support from the under classes
- Political bosses tended to rally around Democrat politicians; reformers gathered Republican support
- Many corrupt political bosses were incarcerated on racketeering or other charges (i.e., Lucky Luciano)
- Progressive mayors and senators of the 1890s sought to clean out corruption at the local level

Question 3

This question asks about the events leading up to the creation of the Bill of Rights in the 1780s and the arguments used by both supporters and opponents.

- A. An effective answer to this question must focus on the sometimes bitter battle over the ratification of the U.S. Constitution in 1787–1788.
- The Philadelphia Convention met in 1787, initially to correct the weaknesses in the Articles of Confederation, but later to create a new document, what we now call the Constitution.
 - Anti-Federalists proposed a Bill of Rights, but the motion was initially rejected by Federalists.
 - The final ratification of the Constitution depended on the support of Anti-Federalists, thus leading to the Bill of Rights, the first ten Amendments to the Constitution.
- B. Supporters of the Bill of Rights were largely Anti-Federalists who put forth the following arguments:
- A strong national government was a threat to individual rights.
 - Without a Bill of Rights, the President would become a king.
 - Individual rights must be explicitly enshrined in law in order to be protected.
 - Patrick Henry demanded that individual rights be explicitly outlined, for fear that the Congress would exploit any ambiguity regarding these rights.
- C. Opponents of the Bill of Rights were largely Federalists who put forth the following arguments:
- Madison claimed that States would have the opportunity to delineate individual rights in their state constitutions; therefore, there was no need for this to be present in the U.S. Constitution.
 - In Federalist #84, Hamilton made the case that a bill of rights was simply unnecessary, since the Constitution itself did not constitute a surrender of individual liberty.
 - The Magna Carta (the foundation for American law) already set the precedent for certain inalienable rights.

Question 4

This question calls for a brief overview of the New Deal along with a discussion of one of its successes and one of its failures.

- A. The New Deal was a series of domestic programs enacted in the United States between 1933 and 1936 and a few that came later. The programs were created in response to the Great Depression, and they focused on what historians call the “3 Rs”: relief, recovery, and reform. That is, relief for the unemployed and poor, recovery of the economy to normal levels, and reform of the financial system to prevent a repeat depression.

The New Deal:

- created a social welfare net for elderly people in the form of Social Security
- created the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation (FDIC) to guarantee bank deposits
- established the Public Works Administration (PWA), the Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC), and the Tennessee Valley Authority (TVA) programs which built roads, sewers, public housing units, and other civic necessities, and addressed unemployment problems
- created both the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB)—which mediates labor disputes—and the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC)—which regulates the stock market
- established a federal minimum wage law
- stabilized the economy and may have prevented the worsening of the Great Depression or the creation of a future one
- galvanized the Democrat Party around expansion of government power and the future implementation of other social programs

B. Failures

- The National Industrial Recovery Act (NIRA) consolidated businesses and coordinated their activities. In 1935, Schechter Poultry Corp. v. United States invalidated sections of the NIRA on the grounds that the codes created under this agency were unconstitutional.
- Leftists, such as Huey Long, complained that the Agricultural Adjustment Act (AAA) policy of paying farmers not to grow was immoral, given that many Americans were still too poor to feed themselves.
- The AAA hurt African-Americans by reducing the need for farmers to hire tenant farmers or sharecroppers.
- Unemployment rates remained in the double-digits throughout the 1930s.
- The so-called “Roosevelt recession” of 1937 was blamed on too much government interference in the economy.
- By the end of the New Deal, the top income tax rate was 79%, the national debt had doubled, and the budget was unbalanced.
- New Deal supporters included many southern Democrats who blocked attempts to address civil rights issues.

C. Reasons

After 1970, conservatives pushed for programs to limit or shrink the size of the federal government. Some responses could include the following:

- Successful programs, such as Social Security, required broad participation by all segments of society, and also provided benefits to all.
- Reaganomics lowered marginal tax rates to reduce government spending.
- Reforms to the welfare system in the 1990s reduced payments and converted the program into block grants for the states.
- In the 1980s, Ronald Reagan moved to deregulate major industries such as finance and energy that had come to be heavily regulated during the New Deal era.

SECTION II, QUESTION 1: THE DOCUMENT-BASED QUESTION

The document-based question begins with a mandatory 15-minute reading period. During these 15 minutes, you'll want to (1) come up with some information not included in the given documents (your outside knowledge) to include in your essay; (2) get an overview of what each document means; (3) decide what opinion you are going to argue; and (4) write an outline of your essay.

This DBQ concerns Northern advantages during the Civil War in regard to supplies and infrastructure. You will have to explore to what extent the North won the war due to these advantages. It would be easiest to argue that supplies and infrastructure were a key reason for victory, but you could also present a more nuanced approach, arguing that supplies and infrastructure were not as important as geographical and tactical strategies. (This approach requires more outside knowledge but could yield a higher score.)

The first thing you want to do, before you look at the documents, is brainstorm for a minute or two. Try to list the most important and relevant things you remember about the Civil War. This list will serve as your reference to the outside information you must provide in order to earn a top grade.

Next, read over the documents. As you read them, take notes in the margins and underline those passages that you are certain you are going to use in your essay. If a document helps you remember a piece of outside information, add that information to your brainstorming list. If you cannot make sense of a document or it argues strongly against your position, relax! You may omit mention of one of the documents and still score well on the DBQ.

You need to look for the following in each document to get the most out of it:

- the author
- the date
- the audience (for whom was the document intended?)
- the significance

Remember: While they are looking for as much in-depth document analysis as possible, it does help to bring in some outside information. Readers will not be able to give you a high score unless you have both! What readers really don't like is a laundry list of documents: That is, a paper in which the student merely goes through the documents, explaining each one. Those students are often the ones who forget to bring in outside information, because they are so focused on going through the documents.

Here is what you might see in the time you have to look over the documents:

The Documents

Document 1: This is a map that illustrates General Winfield Scott's Anaconda Plan. Starting in April 1861 and slowing expanding territory up until mid-1863, the plan depended upon a Union blockade of the Southern ports, and called for an advance down the Mississippi River to cut the South in two. Because the blockade would "suffocate" the South's supply and trade routes, it was similar to the coils of an anaconda suffocating its victim. The Anaconda Plan arguably weakened the South in a passive way, rather than by relying on brute force. It is possible to point out, however, that the blockade was not 100% successful. Southerners found ways to skirt Scott's blockade, thus maintaining about 25% of their supply lines.

Document 2: This map shows territories lost by the Confederacy as the Civil War progressed. The geographical placement of the shaded regions, along with the years those territories lost, support the notion that the North slowly impinged on Southern territories from North to South as the war marched on. Along with Document 1, you can make the case that the Anaconda Plan (started in 1861) was successful. A high-scoring essay will mention that Sherman's March to the Sea accounts for the swath of Georgia territory taken in 1864. If you are taking the position that Northern victory was not primarily about supplies and infrastructure, then this map could serve to provide evidence that territorial acquisition was due more to strategic battles and troop positioning than blockades.

Document 3: This quote by a U.S. Census official reinforces the idea that the rebellion of the South was enabled by its own self-sufficiency (not aid from European manufacturers or financiers), but that the South ultimately did not succeed because of its own isolation and limited resources. The U.S. Census would have kept track of such details as population (including numbers of free and enslaved peoples), numbers of soldiers in the North and South, along with data on railroad infrastructure, manufacturing, arms production, and exports.

Document 4: For this document, the most important facts are:

- The North had a much bigger population.
- The South conscripted a much higher proportion of its male population, but the North had more soldiers in its army (outside knowledge).
- The South had less extensive railroad infrastructure. (Could be used to support either a pro or con argument.)
- The North had much more manufacturing.
- The North produced far more weapons.
- The North did more trading with Europe, and Europe provided more support for the North after the Emancipation Proclamation (outside knowledge).

As an alternative argument, you could also note that the South had a major advantage in certain crop production (namely, cotton), although it is not clear how this would have directly aided the war effort.

Document 5: This quote by Sherman reinforces much of the information already seen in the other documents, BUT notice that he said this before the start of the Civil War (1860), not after. (This is why it's important to notice dates!) Alternatively, you could point out that the war may not have been quite as easy for the North to win as Sherman makes it sound; therefore, supplies and infrastructure may not have been the most important factors.

Document 6: This document outlines the plan for "Sherman's March to the Sea" in late 1864. It pairs well with Document 2, since it shows the territory in question (the port of Savannah) was under Union control in 1864. Some quotes relevant to our essay prompt include:

- In Part IV, Sherman commands the troops to forage for food, showing that the Union was frugal with their supplies. Or, alternatively, perhaps they were short on supplies and need to forage for survival.
- In Part V, Sherman explicitly commands the troops to destroy infrastructure (mills, cotton gins, etc.) in a manner that could be "relentless," depending on the response of the locals in that area.
- In Part VI, Sherman allows for the commandeering of horses, mules, and wagons. Like the first point above, this could either show that the Union was wise in their use of available supplies, or it could show that they were desperate.
- Part VII clearly shows that supplies were considered precious and might need to be rationed under certain circumstances.

Document 7: This document is excerpted from a letter written by a Union soldier to a friend back home. This document may be most useful if your position is such that supplies and infrastructure were not the major reason for the Union victory. This soldier seems to have very little to eat and is plagued by the weather and illness. His unit is outflanked strategically and supplies and infrastructure play no role in the battle. Give yourself major bonus points if you know that the Union eventually won the Battle of Murfreesboro (a few days after this letter was written) by killing off several Confederate brigadier generals.

Outside Information

We have already discussed much more than you could possibly include in a 45-minute essay. Do not worry. You will not be expected to mention everything or even most of what we have covered in the section above. You will, however, be expected to include some outside information—that is, information not mentioned directly in the documents.

Here is some outside information you might have used in your essay. The information is divided into two groups: general concepts and specific events.

General Concepts

- The differing philosophies of government between the Union and the Confederacy set the stage for varying economic successes. The southern states, with their emphasis on the power of the states, as opposed to the central government, lacked the ability to create the industry and centralized financial institutions to keep up with the northern states. In fact, only 13 percent of American banks were situated in the Confederacy. On top of that, the South's investment in a slave economy, as opposed to, say, manufacturing or railroad development, placed it far behind the North in terms of industrial output.
- The population differences between the North and the South were striking. Not only did over twice as many people live in the northern states, but the population of the northern states grew at a faster rate, in no small part due to the immigration waves of the mid-19th century largely favoring the North.
- A variety of factors ranging from the longstanding manufacturing history of the North to the insistence of the South's investment on a slave-labor economy led to the gulf that separated the industrialization of the two regions. The northern industrial advantage provided plenty of supplies, weapons, and infrastructure that the southern states had been dependent upon prior to the war, and excluded from once the war began.
- The connectedness of the North greatly contrasted with that of the South due to the advanced infrastructure in northern states. Rail transport helped move supplies and troops more easily throughout the country. Over 70% of railroads were located in free states, and this kind of infrastructure only helped further develop their industrial output, while the Confederacy pulled men off the railroad for the war effort, leaving railways woefully understaffed.

Specific Events

- The power loom—inventions such as this meant that textile manufacturers could produce both thread and finished fabric in their own factories quickly and efficiently. The resulting product was both of high quality and inexpensive. These kinds of manufacturing breakthroughs rapidly accelerated the development of industrialization in the North.
- The North also benefited from the market economy. In 1820, about one-third of all the food grown in the United States went to market. (The rest was kept for personal consumption.) By 1860, that fraction had doubled. The South did not develop a strong market economy, as did the North; many more Southerners made and grew most of their necessities for survival.
- The northern economy also developed through enticement programs such as the Lowell system. The Lowell system guaranteed employees housing in respectable, chaperoned boardinghouses; cash wages; and participation in cultural and social events organized by the mill.
- Although the vast majority of cotton came from the South, the North profited off the industry in vast ways as clothing manufacturers, also located primarily in the Northeast, transformed the textiles into finished products.
- Canals, roads, and railroads connected northern cities. The construction of the National Road from Maryland to West Virginia (and ultimately to central Ohio) made east-west travel easier, but the big change came with the completion of the Erie Canal in 1825. Funded entirely by the state of New York, the Erie Canal linked the Great Lakes region to New York and thus to European shipping routes. Suddenly, it became lucrative for a Midwestern merchant or farmer to sell his products to Eastern buyers, and as a result, the Northeast soon established itself as the United States' center of commerce.
- The northern economy further benefited from invention of the steam engine, which made way for steamships, boats traveling faster than traditional sailing vessels. Steamships became important freight carriers and replaced sailing ships for long sea voyages. The southern economy could not keep up with these transportation innovations, and became more dependent on northern businesses.
- Immigration waves from the mid-nineteenth century largely benefited the northeast. Irish and German immigrants preferred free states with more advances in transportation, which ultimately provided a large labor pool for northern businesses.
- Sherman's March to the Sea showed a Union strategy to attack the South's limited resources in order to ensure victory. The Confederate economy was severely hampered by the Union's destruction of southern cities and factories, and the claiming of ports.
- With Southern Democrats removed from Congress during the Civil War, Republicans had free reign over creating legislation. The legislation that was prioritized at this time was largely aimed at developing the Union's infrastructure, economy, and land holdings (Pacific Railway Act, Morrill Act, Homestead Act, and the income tax).

Choosing a Side

We have just covered an intimidating amount of material. Do not worry; your essay only has to cover some of the points mentioned above. This review mentions nearly everything you might include in a successful essay, not everything that must be in a successful essay.

Your next task is to choose a position to argue and then construct a strong justification from your notes on the documents and outside information. Document-based questions are written so that there is no one right answer, and there are many different defensible positions to this question. There are also many different ways to argue the same point; that is, there is no one right way to write an essay for any given argument.

Here are some positions you might argue:

- The Union was victorious precisely because of the advantages it held in terms of infrastructure, economics, and technology.
- The Union was victorious for a variety of reasons, but its infrastructure and supplies did not play a meaningful role on the battlefield.
- While the Union held significant advantages in terms of infrastructure, economics, and technology, those advantages did not make the victory entirely inevitable.

Planning Your Essay

Unless you read extremely quickly, you probably won't have time to write a detailed outline for your essay during the 15-minute reading period. However, it is worth taking several minutes to jot down a loose structure of your essay, because it will actually save you time when you write. First, decide on your thesis and write it down in the test booklet. Then, take a few minutes to brainstorm all the points you might put in your essay. Choose the strongest points and number them in the order you plan to present them. Lastly, note which documents and outside information you plan to use in conjunction with each point. If you organize before you write, the actual writing process will go much more smoothly. More importantly, you will not write yourself into a corner, and suddenly find yourself making a point you cannot support or heading toward a weak conclusion (or worse still, no conclusion at all).

For example, if you are going to argue that the North won the Civil War due to its advantages with regards to supplies and infrastructure, you might write down an abbreviated version of that thesis, such as the following:

The North won due to advanced infrastructure.

Then you would brainstorm a list of ideas and events you wanted to mention in your essay, such as these.

*Advanced resources
Economic output increased in the North
Weapons development
Geography
South allotted most resources to slavery
Technology development
Railroad production
Enormity of northern banks
Taking of ports and "March to the Sea"
Anaconda plan
Battles in South disrupted Confederate production
Population differences
Immigrants settle in the North
Relationships with Europe*

Next, you would want to figure out which of your brainstorm ideas could be the main idea of a paragraph, which could be used as evidence to support a point, and which should be eliminated. You would probably want to begin your first paragraph by stating your thesis and then discussing how the Union was victorious due to advanced resources. Your first point, “advanced resources,” could be the main idea of that paragraph. “Railroad production” would help explain why the Union had advanced resources, so you could use that as evidence. At this point, your list might look like this:

Advanced resources	point 1
Economic output increased in the North
Weapons development
Geography
South allotted most resources to slavery
Technology development
Railroad production	evidence for point 1
Enormity of northern banks
Taking of ports and “March to the Sea”
Anaconda plan
Battles in South disrupted Confederate production
Population differences
Immigration settle in the North
Relationships with Europe

What else would you want to mention in this paragraph? Certainly refer to Document 3, the census returns that claimed the Confederacy lacked manufacturing and mechanical resources. You might also mention advances in manufacturing that were unique to the North, such as the Lowell system. Mentioning this point helps you fulfill the requirement to include outside information.

Next you might want to discuss how the Union’s infrastructure could take advantage of its geography. That would make “geography” the subject of paragraph 2; “anaconda plan” and “March to the Sea” are pieces of evidence you might want to mention in this paragraph. Now your list might look like this:

Advanced resources	point 1
Economic output increased in the North
Weapons development
Geography	point 2
South allotted most resources to slavery
Technology development
Railroad production	evidence for point 1
Enormity of northern banks
Taking of ports and “March to the Sea”	evidence for point 2
Anaconda plan	evidence for point 2
Battles in South disrupted Confederate production
Population differences
Immigrants settle in the North
Relationships with Europe

In this paragraph you probably also want to mention Documents 1 and 2. Proceed in this way until you have finished planning your strategy. Try to fit as many of the documents into your argument as you can, but do not stretch too far to fit one in. An obvious, desperate stretch will only hurt your grade.

As you write, remember that you do not have to fall entirely on one side or another of this issue. History is complex, and simple explanations are rarely accurate ones. If your essay argues that the Union persevered due to its advantages in technology and infrastructure and then discusses the events referred to by the documents in the context of the benefits of northern technology and infrastructure, you will score highly on your DBQ essay.

Arguing Against Supplies and Infrastructure as the Reason for Northern Victory

If you choose to argue that the Union was victorious for other reasons, you should concentrate on Documents 1, 2, 5, 6, and 7. Use Document 1 if you are comfortable explaining that the Anaconda Plan was not failsafe, as the Confederacy still held a quarter of its own supply lines. Document 2 could just as easily be used to explain that Union victory was due to strategic battles as it is to prove that resources were the key to victory. Document 5 could be useful since it was created before the war and was purely speculative—the war turned out to be more difficult than Sherman makes it sound here. Document 6 shows us how supplies were not as easy to come by as one might think. Soldiers were foraging for food and supplies were rationed. Finally, Document 7 would further support the idea that the Union was victorious in spite of a dearth of supplies on the battlefield.

What You Should Have Discussed

Regardless of which thesis you choose, your essay should discuss all of the following:

- Geographical advantages of the North
- Isolation of the South
- Population of the North
- Centrality of manufacturing to the Union's victory (both weapons and otherwise)
- Railroad development
- Technologies developed and used in the North
- Economic advantage of northern cities
- Impact of the war being largely fought on southern soil

Give yourself very high marks for outside knowledge if you mention any five of the following:

- Strategy of destroying mills and anything related to manufacturing, knowing the centrality of these resources to military success
- Union victory at the Battle of Murfreesboro despite the shortage of food and supplies
- The strategy of blocking ports on the southern coast and along the Mississippi River
- The Union's trade relationship with Europe (this was especially strong after the Emancipation Proclamation)
- Sherman's March
- The South only held about 29 percent of the nation's railroad tracks.
- Pacific Railway Act
- The war effort fostered an economic and industrial expansion in the North
- An overwhelming amount of mid-19th century immigrants (7/8) were drawn to free states' passage of the income tax
- Grant's use of rail and improved steamship technology
- The Homestead Act and the Morrill Act, which helped increase abolitionist land, industrial know-how, and military education in the Union

SECTION II, QUESTION 2: THE LONG ESSAY QUESTION

Question 2

If you chose this prompt, you should have mentioned some of the following:

- Republican Motherhood: The role of women was elevated to include the notion that a mother's duty was to raise her children to be good citizens. In essence, motherhood was no longer perceived as merely a domestic, private role, but was now thought to be part of a civic duty.
- Women during this time period still resided in the domestic sphere. They did not pursue professional careers, nor did they hold office. They did not vote.
- Abigail Adams advocated for the education of women, as demonstrated in many of her letters to her husband, John Adams. ("Remember the ladies...")
- The education of women had been promoted in as early as the 1670s and steadily became more popular throughout the 18th century. So, you could make the case that the Revolution did not make a change in this arena.
- In the religious sphere, Protestant ministers of this time tended to emphasize the inherent modesty and purity in women's natures, as opposed to the inferiority of women promoted in earlier Puritan times.
- Since the Revolution was a battle for individual rights, it would be increasingly difficult to deny those rights to women. John Locke actually promoted equality between the sexes.
- You could easily make the case that the women of the early 19th century (Lydia Maria Child, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Louisa May Alcott, Sojourner Truth, to name only a few) were far more accomplished than their predecessors, and that this was brought on by the liberties gained during the Revolution.

Question 3

If you chose this prompt, you should have mentioned some of the following:

- The Market Revolution expanded commerce from the local to the global, thus expanding the need for labor in all sectors, including those in which slaves were used (i.e., "King Cotton").
- Northern cities expanded manufacturing and developed infrastructure, leading to additional economic opportunities for under-educated freedmen.
- Slavery did not end until the close of the Civil War.
- BUT, the expansion of the national economy during the period of 1800–1850 may well have spurred the issue of slavery to public debate, hastening abolition (i.e., the Missouri Compromise was necessary due to expanded populations and immigration).
- OR, the Northern demand for cotton may have slowed abolition by encouraging the increased use of slaves.
- Slaves would have had access to better farm implements, thanks to inventions such as the cotton gin, the steel plow, and the mechanical reaper.
- The Market Revolution decreased the prices on certain necessities, making life cheaper for the lower classes.
- Conditions may have been worse for some slaves after incidents such as the Nat Turner Rebellion.
- By 1850, the abolition movement and The Underground Railroad were much more mainstream than they had been in 1800.

Question 4

If you chose this prompt, you should have mentioned some of the following:

- The New Deal marked a new trend in government intervention in the economy. Unlike during other panics in the past, in which banks and businesses were allowed to fail (“laissez-faire” economics), the federal government took bold measures to try to prop up the low unemployment rate (through work programs) and provide security to banks and account-holders (FDR’s bank holiday and FDIC)
- The public became more amenable to government interventions in the economy, paving the way for Johnson’s New Society in the 1960s.
- Conservatives became more vigilant regarding government intervention in the economy, reversing some of FDRs reforms.
- In the 1940s, the unemployment rate actually dipped lower than pre-Depression levels.
- The implementation of Social Security program affected investing habits, retirement age, and created a powerful block of older voters dedicated to electing politicians who would preserve this program.
- After the Great Depression, brokerage firms became more cautious, requiring stricter margin ratios for investors buying stocks with “borrowed” money.
- After the Great Depression, Americans lived and invested more conservatively. Some refused to trust banks or invest in the stock market.
- Women entered the workforce in large numbers during World War II, paving the way for large rates of female employment in the 1960s and beyond.
- New Deal work programs accelerated the completion of electrification in rural areas (TVA), aiding in economic growth after the Depression.
- Economists largely agree that interventions by the Fed may help to prevent future depressions.
