SECTION I, PART A: MULTIPLE-CHOICE QUESTIONS

Questions 1–3

One of Abigail Adams's letters to her husband became well known for its advocacy of women. The "Remember the Ladies" letter used revolutionary language (tyrants, rebellion) to urge John Adams to treat women well under the new government.

1. D In the excerpt, Abigail Adams implores her husband to "remember the ladies" while developing a new independent government. While women were important to the American revolution, there was no serious political discussion at this time about an equal rights amendment (particularly since the Constitution hadn't yet been created); eliminate (A). Higher education was still very uncommon for women in the revolutionary era; eliminate (B). While Adams would likely be supportive of the right for women to vote, she is not part of a larger political movement at this time; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is correct because Adams uses the same rhetoric that patriots used in opposing the British to demand fair treatment from those same patriot leaders for women.
2. C Adams' letter reveals the increasing political visibility of women even if they were not going to be given formal suffrage rights yet. Churches were still dominated largely by men (Anne Hutchinson was exiled from Massachusetts Bay in the 1600s for attempting to preach herself); eliminate (A). Women supported the revolutionary war effort through groups such as the Daughters of Liberty, but they had always been expected to maintain their roles as wives and mothers through this period; eliminate (B). There was little need for women to take the jobs of men as the country was still largely agrarian during this time (and they already would have been helping out with farm-work to begin with); eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because this source reflects the ideas of republican motherhood that became popular in America after the war.
3. A The reference to her husband's ancestors reflects a tone that reaches far back into history—a history that has largely excluded women from decision-making positions. Therefore, the answer is (A), which refers to the treatment of women throughout history. This contradicts (C). Choice (B) is incorrect because women did not hold any rights during the colonial period that were unique for the time. There is no reference to women in the military, so (D) is not supported by the text.

Questions 4–5

This treaty is better known as the Louisiana Purchase. Napoleon wanted to get out of the Western Hemisphere following the Haitian slave revolt. Even though Jefferson wanted to purchase only New Orleans, which would provide the United States with a strategic trade port, he was enticed by the low price to purchase the entire Louisiana Territory from the French.

4. A Article III outlines the process by which the people of the newly admitted territory would be granted citizenship of the United States. The Bill of Rights might be tempting since the article says that the people would maintain all of the rights under the Constitution, but the ratification of the Bill of Rights was more related to compromise between competing political factions over the powers of the government; eliminate (B). The article never discusses the relationship between the state and federal government; eliminate (C). The Proclamation Line explicitly restricted the colonists from settling further westward, the opposite of what is happening here; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is correct because the Northwest Ordinance established a framework for admitting new territory into the US, further built upon in this treaty.
5. C The question asks who would oppose the policy, which in this case is the Louisiana Purchase. Southern plantation owners benefited from the acquisition of this territory as it further allowed for slavery to expand to states like Louisiana; eliminate (A). Inland frontier settlers would look forward to the opportunity to move further west; eliminate (B). The president who signed this treaty was Jefferson, himself a Chesapeake Jeffersonian Republican; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because New England Federalists accused Jefferson of violating his principles of limited government in enacting this treaty.

Questions 6–9

This chart shows the electoral vote and popular vote totals from the 1824 election. This was one of the more noteworthy elections in American history due to the fact that there was no winner in the electoral college. Andrew Jackson was the largest vote getter by a long shot, but according to the Constitution, this election had to be decided by Congress. Henry Clay was the Speaker of the House and was able to convince the legislative body to vote for the most realistic candidate who was not Andrew Jackson.

6. C This election was decided by the House of Representatives because not a single candidate received a majority of votes—one more than half of all electoral votes. Choice (C) is the correct answer. Choice (B) is incorrect because Henry Clay was not the least popular candidate: Clay had nearly 7,000 more popular votes than Crawford. Choice (D) is incorrect because the House chose Adams in this election, not Jackson. Be careful not to choose (A). It is incorrect because a plurality of votes means the most votes when no candidate receives a majority. Andrew Jackson received a plurality of both the popular votes and the electoral votes.
7. B The outcome of the popular vote saw Andrew Jackson get more votes than any other candidate (though not a majority). Jackson's support was not primarily driven by votes from immigrants as he tended to have more support in southern and western states; eliminate (A). Sectional division was increasing, but in this particular election, it wasn't the primary driver (given that 3 of the candidates were from the South); eliminate (C). The Monroe Doctrine as a policy that Quincy Adams himself had supported (and that the other candidates running generally agreed with); eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because Jackson's success owed itself more to his populist icon status and support from non-property-owning men who were voting in larger numbers.

8. A After this election, Andrew Jackson organized his supporters into the Democratic Party to successfully win the presidency 4 years later. Though it did happen contemporaneously, this election did not directly contribute to the emergence of the Second Great Awakening; eliminate (B). Debates persisted over support for internal improvements (Jackson's party was largely opposed to it); eliminate (C). In this period, the government never placed strict limits on settlers' ability to move westward; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is correct because this election presaged the creation of a new party system with the Democrats fighting the Whigs for control of government.
9. C Choice (A) is incorrect because Jackson, a Tennessean, represented a more rural base, while Adams, from New England, had more urban connections. Adams supported tariffs, which were opposed by Jackson's supporters, so eliminate (B). Choice (D) is incorrect because Jackson vetoed the recharter of the Second National Bank, leading to its closure. Choice (C) is correct because it properly designates Adams as a supporter of expanding federal power and Jackson as an advocate of states' rights.

Questions 10–12

Joseph Smith founded the Church of Latter Day Saints in western New York in 1830. After encountering difficulty establishing themselves in Ohio and Missouri, Smith and his followers, known as Mormons, moved to Illinois. Smith was killed by a mob in Illinois and Brigham Young eventually led the Mormons to Utah, where they experienced considerably less resistance. This warrant for Joseph Smith's arrest describes Smith breaking into a newspaper office to destroy its printing press. One can imagine why Smith, an outsider who came to Illinois to find converts, would not see the local press as an ally.

10. C The rise of democratic and individualistic beliefs (A), a reaction against pure rationalism (D), and economic changes in society, along with greater social and geographical mobility (C), all contributed to a Second Great Awakening among Protestants that influenced moral and social reforms (B) and inspired religious movements such as Mormonism.
11. B The date of 1844 should remind you that we are in the midst of the Second Great Awakening. This was a Protestant religious movement whose adherents were over-represented in rural parts of the East such as Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio. Not many Catholics (A) would likely be drawn to Mormonism, nor would atheists (C). Choice (D) is outside the era, since Puritans were active in the 17th and 18th centuries.
12. C The arrest warrant for Joseph Smith clearly shows that this was a religious group that was not particularly welcome in many parts of the country. Armed conflict between competing political factions best describes events like Bleeding Kansas, which was more directly tied to slavery; eliminate (A). Overseas expansion is more closely tied to the late 1800s; eliminate (B). The divine mission for the US to expand (or Manifest Destiny) was not tied explicitly to Mormonism; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because Mormons were crucial to Western settlement in the 1800s when they settled in modern day Utah.

Questions 13–15

As the Whigs split over the slavery issue, new parties arose to oppose the expansion of slavery—including the Free-Soil Party, a regional, single-issue party. The Free-Soil Party was largely opposed to the expansion of slavery not because they were abolitionists but because they didn't want white settlers to have to compete with slave labor in new territories. The men on the right are standing on planks labeled “Democratic Platform,” conveying the idea that slavery is being forced upon the new territories by the Democrats.

13. C The cartoon is most closely aligned with the perspective of a Free Soiler. Southern slave owners were most likely to argue that slavery was a positive good; eliminate (A). Abolitionists pushed for immediate abolition, which was a different position from the Free Soil movement; eliminate (B). Some antislavery groups pushed for removal of former slaves to Africa such as the American Colonization Society, but there's not enough evidence in the cartoon to prove that one way or the other here; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because the Free Soil platform called for preventing the expansion of slavery into western territories
14. B The cartoon is from 1856, which is especially important in answering this question. The Compromise of 1850 was controversial but it was 6 years prior to this cartoon; eliminate (A). The Dred Scott case would not be decided by the Supreme Court until 1857, a year after the cartoon; eliminate (C). Even though the person pictured looks vaguely like Abraham Lincoln, he would not be elected president until 1860; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because the Kansas Nebraska Act passed in 1854, and the cartoon directly references Kansas as a sticking point in debates between Free Soilers and slavery supporters.
15. B The cartoon reflects a Free Soil point of view, and Free Soilers preferred a strategy of stopping the expansion of slavery rather than destroying the system outright. The League of Nations was proposed by American president Woodrow Wilson but the US itself never joined, and it has little bearing on Free Soil strategy; eliminate (A). Reductions in tensions through policies like Detente would not be appealing to Free Soilers who had little interest in compromising with Southern slave owners; eliminate (C). Despite their opposition to slavery, free soilers tended to be less militant than abolitionists, so aggressive military action would likely not be their preferred strategy; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because in the same way the US sought to contain Soviet communism, the Free Soilers wanted to contain slavery to the South.

Questions 16–18

This painting, Westward the Course of Empire Takes Its Way, by Emanuel Leutze, was painted in 1861, just a year before the Homestead Act. The painting depicts settlers looking out over unsettled land. This painting captures the ideal of mid-19th-century politicians and pioneers alike—the West was America's to discover and settle. This concept is known as Manifest Destiny.

16. C The painting shows pioneers moving west and building new settlements. In the late 1800s, the government supported this movement through many means. The government use the military to clear Native Americans out of many midwestern territories to open them up to farmers; eliminate (A). The government created the Homestead Act to effectively grant free land to many western settlers; eliminate (B).

The government also passed the Pacific Railway Act which helped stimulate railroad growth in western territories too; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because negotiations with European countries like the Louisiana Purchase and the Oregon Territory happened before this time period.

17. D The painting shows the process of American expansion in the mid 1800s, often known as Manifest Destiny. While many international migrants did arrive from Europe in this period (including the painter himself!), this was not a major issue when it came to westward settlement; eliminate (A). Tariffs were a huge source of controversy but more during the Jacksonian era; eliminate (B). The same goes for the expansion of the political franchise, which has already happened by this point; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is the answer because westward settlement exposed a huge rift between Free Soilers and slave owners in places like Kansas.
18. B In 1800 to 1848, political parties underwent major transformations. The Federalist party largely died out after the War of 1812 and strongly opposed policies such as Jefferson's Louisiana Purchase; eliminate (A). The Whigs were mostly focused on opposing Andrew Jackson and inherited many of the positions of the Federalists; eliminate (C). The Republicans did not exist until the 1850s; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because Democrats such as Andrew Jackson and James K. Polk strongly supported westward expansion through this period.

Questions 19–21

Following the Civil War, many Northerners sought economic opportunities in the war-damaged South. These Northerners were known as “carpetbaggers,” so called due to the types of bags into which these folks packed their belongings when they relocated to the South. Southerners resented the fact that outsiders would come to their hometowns to make money when the economy was so tight following the war, so “carpetbagger” became a derisive term. Adding to the resentment was the fact that the federal government created avenues for carpetbaggers to find employment.

19. C The cartoon depicts President Grant on a throne made of a “carpet bag,” a reference to the carpetbaggers derided by southerners, indicating this cartoon is not favorable toward Reconstruction policies. By 1872, the Civil War had ended, and the South had already been divided into military districts; eliminate (A). The cartoonist likely thinks these policies are unfair, but not because southerners were being forced to pay back war debts; eliminate (B). Weapon confiscation was not a policy pursued by the Grant administration; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because many southerners perceived Military Reconstruction as heavy-handed and especially resented the imposition of new civil rights amendments and laws.
20. A The Freedmen's Bureau established schools and provided opportunities for carpetbaggers to become teachers. Choice (B) is incorrect because while the Morrill Act led to the establishment of schools, those schools were institutions of higher learning and were not associated with carpetbaggers. Choice (C) is incorrect because the Reconstruction Act established a military presence in the South, but was not a program that attracted carpetbaggers. Choice (D) is also incorrect, as the Enforcement Act protected African Americans from intimidation at voting booths and therefore is not related to this image.

21. A The position of the cartoonist is that the northern Republicans are using the carpetbaggers to profit from rebuilding of the South. In response, supporters of President Grant would defend the policy of Reconstruction. In order to defend the federal presence in the South, Republicans would have claimed that it is necessary for the government to take an active role, including protecting the rights of former slaves. This is consistent with (A).

Questions 22–24

Ignatius Donnelly delivered his speech in 1892 to the Farmer's Alliance. In this era, the Grangers, a farmer's organization, had organized politically to form the Populist Party, a movement dedicated to righting some of the wrongs Donnelly highlights: corruption, overindebtedness to banks, poverty, and economic imbalances between the rich and poor.

22. B The author is a part of the Farmer's Alliance, a key part of the Populist movement. Farmers likely did worry about the environment but particular concerns over issues like soil erosion were not as salient until the Dust Bowl several decades later; eliminate (A). The author does mention economic inequality, but the audience is primarily agrarian and not industrial workers; eliminate (C). The Second Great Awakening was several decades before this speech was given; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because the Farmers Alliance was particularly concerned about the economic plight of farmers at the turn of the century.
23. A Even though the federal government helped to create necessary infrastructure such as railroad, private companies ended up running them, often engaging in price gouging, which created a difficult situation for farmers who depended on railroads. The case Munn v. Illinois specifically dealt with grain elevators that were overcharging customers for storage. The state of Illinois imposed a maximum price that a business may charge for grain storage, which was challenged in court. The Supreme Court decided in favor of Illinois, affirming that state governments may regulate private businesses. Choice (A) is correct.
24. C To modify the claim, we would need to find evidence that undermines what the author is saying (namely, that big business is dominating politics). Global crop prices did decline significantly and it was a major reason for the instability that farmers faced; eliminate (A). Laws like the Sherman Antitrust Act often were used to target labor unions, which further supports Donnelly's point; eliminate (B). Railroad companies received major grants through the Pacific Railway Act, a sore spot for people like Donnelly who wanted to see these businesses regulated; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because the philanthropy of people like Andrew Carnegie cuts against Donnelly's claim that the wealthy "despise the Republic."

Questions 25–28

This document discusses the prevalence of child labor in South Carolina. The document is from 1909, which is the reform-oriented Progressive Era, but a federal ban on the practice of child labor did not actually occur until the late 1930s with the Fair Labor Standards Act. This document discusses how child labor, despite being illegal at the local level, could still be practiced by evading the law.

25. D With an increasing amount of productivity during the Industrial Revolution, new jobs opened up around the country. Industrialists turned to women and children as a low-cost way to fill these new positions, so (D) is correct. Since this productivity was the result of manufacturing and not agriculture, (B) is incorrect. Choice (A) is incorrect because strict labor laws would have prevented this kind of child labor. Choice (C) is incorrect because in 1909, there was not yet a Supreme Court ruling on child labor. Further, the courts favored business and not the working class during this period.
26. B The excerpt highlights the poor working conditions of children working in factories in South Carolina. The source does not tell us anything about the relative scale (or lack thereof) of industrialization in the South as it only focuses on a small subset of mills; eliminate (A). The source focuses primarily on poor children workers but doesn't highlight their condition relative to the rich; eliminate (C). In the source, the child workers are not organizing specifically against their employers; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because this source highlights the work of a muckraker who sought to expose the poor conditions in the factories.
27. C Middle class Progressive reformers were the group most likely to challenge conditions such as those described in the passage. The First Great Awakening saw an upsurge in religious activity but is more connected with the movement for independence than any specific reform movements; eliminate (A). The Revolutionary era saw strong debates over the relationship between the federal and state governments but that's not as relevant to this context; eliminate (B). The Reagan Revolution saw a major reduction in the size and scope of the federal government, something that reformers in the early 1900s would likely not have supported. Choice (C) is the correct answer because the Progressive reforms of the early 1900s are most similar to the Moral Reform movements in the early 1800s including temperance and the abolition of slavery.
28. D Captains of industry looked to maximize profit and child labor was cheap, which helped to increase corporate profits. Eliminate (A). Both the McKinley administration and the Supreme Court of the Gilded Age were pro-business, so neither prioritized ending child labor. Both (B) and (C) are wrong. The reforms of the Progressive Movement often focused on labor practices. Even though there was not a lasting federal law that combated child labor until 1938, the Progressives had enough success at the local level to begin to put an end to the practice of child labor. Choice (D) is correct.

Questions 29–32

These two documents highlight a debate of the late 19th and early 20th centuries—imperialism. In this text, Senator Beveridge of Indiana advocates the expansion of the United States to new territories in order to spread American ideals. Of course, the natural resources and military advantages are also beneficial, albeit less moral, reasons for expansion. The American Anti-Imperialist League, on the other hand, uses the American ideals of self-governance and liberty to argue the immorality of imperialism.

29. A Beveridge notes that “it is ours to save that soil for liberty and civilization”; therefore, the correct answer should focus not on the exploitation of natural resources, but on noble pursuits, such as enhancing freedom in other parts of the world. Choices (B), (C), and (D) all focus on economic exploitation and the control of resources. Choice (A) is correct because imperialists claimed that the Spanish mistreated Cuban colonists.
30. D The source is the anti-imperialist league, which by its title already suggests that it is against imperialism. The source never talks about whether the Constitution affords the government the power to colonize; eliminate (A). The expenses tied to maintaining the empire are not broached in the source; eliminate (B). The authors might agree that profiting off another country’s natural resources is unjust, but that’s not the main focus of the excerpt; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is correct because the source talks about the rights to “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness” being fundamental to American identity and that imperialism violates those principles.
31. A In the excerpt, Beveridge is emphasizing America’s “duty” to expand and colonize. Supporters of Beveridge’s perspective also tended to support the assimilation of Native Americans through laws like the Dawes Act; eliminate (B). Many expansionists were split on the issue of immigration, and we don’t have enough information here to know how Dawes would feel about it; eliminate (C). Beveridge’s arguments fit in neatly with theories of Social Darwinism; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is correct because Beveridge explicitly wrote this source to support American control of the Philippines.
32. B Use Process of Elimination. Imperialists such as Beveridge were often interested in spreading American influence throughout the world, but not always with a focus on the well-being of the colonized people. Eliminate (A). Beveridge does not discuss military commitments in this passage, so (C) is incorrect. Beveridge also did not attack the patriotism of his opponents, so eliminate (D). Choice (B) is the only answer remaining and is therefore correct.

Questions 33–35

Huey Long was initially a supporter of Franklin Roosevelt, but felt that Roosevelt had abandoned his more Progressive ideals. Senator Long strongly believed in a decentralization of wealth—allowing wealth to spread among the social classes. Long represented a vociferous voice of opposition from the American Left, an ironic stance according to the businesses and millionaires who saw FDR’s policies as too left-wing to begin with.

33. C Senator Long states that both President Hoover and President Roosevelt claimed “there had to be a decentralization of wealth, but neither one of them did anything about it.” Long implies that decentralizing wealth was the right thing to do and would lead to electoral success for candidates who campaign on it. Decentralization of wealth refers to spreading wealth from the few to the many. This is consistent with (C).
34. D Long is writing about the economic problems during the Great Depression. He is critical of both Roosevelt and Hoover for not going far enough in their support for the working class. Long would likely believe that saving America’s banking system would be a handout for the rich; eliminate (A). Ending Prohibition was an issue that FDR ran on (and successfully did), but Long would likely not think it would do much to address people’s economic situation; eliminate (B). Long favored direct payments to workers far more than federal work programs like the WPA; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is correct because Long is most famous for his “Share Our Wealth” program that called for massive redistribution of wealth from the richest Americans in favor of the poor and unemployed.
35. D Senator Long’s message is critical of the wealthiest class of Americans. This skeptical view of the upper class and business was shared by the frustrated farmers and union workers in the Gilded Age who created the Populist Party. Choice (D) is correct.

Questions 36–39

George Kennan wrote this document, the Long Telegram, to recommend a strategic foreign policy to the Truman Administration. In this passage, Kennan describes the zero-sum approach of the Soviets—they never make compacts or compromises, only to destroy rival power. Kennan’s recommendation becomes known as containment policy—the United States will not seek war with the Soviets, but will also limit the spread of Soviet influence.

36. B The Long Telegram informed Truman’s containment policy, which, while not directly fighting the Soviet Union, brought the United States to intervene in other parts of the world where Communism was spreading. Choice (B) is correct. Eliminate (D) since this policy is certainly not one of neutrality. The end of World War II brought about a healthy economy, so (A) is incorrect. While there was a baby boom following the Second World War, it is irrelevant to Truman’s containment policy. Eliminate (C).
37. D The excerpt warns of the dangers of the Soviet Union and suggests a role for Western governments in combating its influence. The United States joining the United Nations would not be a policy that would necessarily incite confrontation between the US and Soviet Union (though they did have plenty of disagreements in that forum over the years); eliminate (A). The Space Race certainly was a way for the US to expand its influence after the war, but it’s not as directly related to Kennan’s discussion here; eliminate (B). The Red Scare after World War II targeted groups like labor organizers, but that was internal to the US, not external like the source suggests. Choice (D) is correct because Kennan was a strong supporter of the Marshall Plan, which was used to rebuild countries like Greece and Turkey and prevent communists from gaining a foothold in those nations.

38. B Containment policy was intended to stop the spread of Communism, though not to directly fight the Soviet Union, so eliminate (D). For a long time in the early part of the Cold War, there was little in terms of peace talks and the United States created an embargo on trade with the Eastern Bloc and the Soviet Union. Eliminate (A) and (C). Choice (B) is correct because it describes the strategy behind containment policy.
39. C The excerpt highlights strong American pressure on the Soviet Union and communism generally. America sought regime change in Cuba in the 1960s to overthrow the communist leader Fidel Castro; eliminate (A). The Vietnam War in the 1960s was also an effort to defeat a communist government; eliminate (B). Americans boycotted the Olympics in 1980 in response to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because America recognizing the communist government of China could be perceived as going against the policy of containment outlined in this source.

Questions 40–42

This speech by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. in Montgomery, Alabama came on the heels of the arrest of Rosa Parks. By championing the Montgomery Bus Boycott, King was introduced to the United States as an advocate of nonviolent resistance. This speech celebrates the ability to protest in the United States, a freedom not guaranteed in the Soviet Union.

40. C Dr. King precedes the reference to the “iron curtains” by mentioning the “glory of our democracy.” That is, he celebrates the freedom to be able to speak out against the injustices of the government, a core civil liberty. Choice (C) is the correct answer.
41. B In this excerpt, King asserts the right of civil rights protesters to protest for change. Though court rulings in the 1950s like Brown v. Board of Education were important victories, King is not petitioning the Supreme Court here; eliminate (A). Economic equality did not become a larger goal of many civil rights protesters until the 1960s; eliminate (C). Beat poets certainly were critical of conformity in the 1950s, but they were not closely aligned with civil rights protestors (this connection grows in the 1960s); eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because King calls for nonviolent protest to support this cause in the excerpt.
42. D In the excerpt, King is emphasizing the importance of freedom of speech. The Alien and Sedition Acts were considered an affront to this idea by people like Thomas Jefferson; eliminate (A). During World War I, the Supreme Court upheld restrictions on speech in cases like Schenck v. United States to protect national security; eliminate (B). After World War I, the United States instituted what came to be known as Palmer Raids, cracking down on supposed labor radicals and deporting many of them in the 1920s; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is correct because one of Roosevelt’s Four Freedoms is the Freedom of Speech, something that King would likely agree with.

Questions 43–45

Betty Friedan's book The Feminine Mystique openly challenged many people's assumptions about women's place in society. Frustrated with being treated as second-class citizens, women became more politically active during the 1960s. Friedan's book, and work as a founder of NOW (the National Organization of Women), reawakened the women's movement, which had faded since the passage of the Nineteenth Amendment in 1920.

43. B Friedan writes about “the problem that has no name stirring in the minds of so many American women today.” The issue she describes is not quantifiable—it is the feeling women have about wanting more out of life than domesticity. Choices (A) and (C) would not work because they are both empirical data. Eliminate (D) because it is too early for the time period referenced in this passage. Choice (B) is correct because it is a source that can illuminate the inner feelings of women in the 1960s.
44. A Friedan's book became a cornerstone of the Second Wave Feminist movement. Though feminists supported the Equal Rights Amendment, it was never ratified; eliminate (B). Supreme Court decisions like Roe v. Wade did protect the right to abortion, but this was not done by Congress; eliminate (C). In the late 20th century, women's participation in the labor force increased instead of decreasing; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is correct because Friedan strongly influenced the sexual revolution of the 1960s.
45. A In the source, the author talks about dissatisfaction that many women feel over their supposed role as mothers and caregivers for families. The temperance movement was largely organized by women in the 1800s; though their experiences as mothers often informed their activism, it gave way to a larger suffrage movement; eliminate (B). The “New Woman” of the 1920s enjoyed a new degree of independence (though this often disappeared after marriage); eliminate (C). Women worked in large numbers during both world wars in factories to replace men who had been drafted; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is correct because the Cult of Domesticity is exactly the thing that the author is criticizing.

Questions 46–47

The Twenty-fourth Amendment to the Constitution was ratified in 1964. The Amendment calls for an end to the poll tax, one of several practices used since Reconstruction to prevent African Americans from voting. It is important to note the historical context of this Amendment. It was the second of four amendments passed over a 10-year period, making the 1960s an unusually active time for amending the Constitution. It also came during a time of significant civil rights legislation including the 1964 Civil Rights Act, the 1965 Voting Rights Act, and the 1968 Housing Rights Act.

46. A The 24th Amendment ended poll taxes, which were disproportionately used to target voters of color in the South. While the amendment certainly reaffirmed the power of the federal government over the states, this is not really a reform, as the federal government had been placing restrictions on states since the Reconstruction amendments; eliminate (B). Poll taxes have nothing to do with property ownership, and non-property owners were already allowed to vote by 1964; eliminate (C). This amendment was targeted toward Southern states but it wouldn't have reduced their influence in presidential elections since they would still have the same number of electoral college votes; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is correct because this amendment is in keeping with the 15th Amendment passed during Reconstruction.

47. B The earlier question highlights that this Amendment was made to fulfill a Reconstruction-era promise. The 19th Amendment guaranteeing the right to vote was not passed until 1919; eliminate (A). The direct election of senators is closer chronologically to Reconstruction, but poll taxes had nothing to do with combatting that; eliminate (C). The federal voting age was not lowered to 18 until the 26th amendment in 1971; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because poll taxes were explicitly used to challenge Black voting rights after the Civil War.

Questions 48–51

Ronald Reagan was the beneficiary of a number of factors that led to his election in 1980. In this document, he discusses a couple of them: the ongoing economic crisis and a general growing mistrust of government. Reagan's position as a political outsider permitted him to be seen as a credible personality when speaking on the concerns of Americans.

48. B In this excerpt, Reagan argues that “government is not the solution to our problem; government is the problem.” In the 1900s, Progressives supported expanding the role of government through tools like trustbusting; eliminate (A). In the 1930s, Franklin Roosevelt's New Deal created an unprecedented number of federal programs; eliminate (C). In the 1960s, Lyndon Johnson's Great Society further expanded federal government power through programs like Medicare; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because the 1920s saw the federal government embracing laissez-faire economic policies consistent with Reagan's rhetoric.
49. D Reagan's supporters came from many walks of life. He courted evangelical voters who particularly were upset about laws around abortion and school prayer; eliminate (A). High income voters favored Reagan for his views on tax cuts; eliminate (B). Reagan fashioned himself as an aggressive Cold Warrior and dramatically increased military spending; eliminate (C). Choice (D) is correct because civil rights activists tended to be skeptical of Reagan's cuts to government spending that they felt disproportionately targeted the poor.
50. B In the 1970s, the American economy was undergoing difficulties primarily due to a phenomenon known as “stagflation.” Recession and unemployment is associated more closely with the Great Depression; eliminate (A). Oil prices actually skyrocketed in the 1970s, leading to an energy crisis that caused more inflation; eliminate (C). Reagan himself famously increased the deficit with stronger military spending, so this probably isn't what he had in mind; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because it best describes the phenomenon of stagflation.
51. B In the excerpt, Reagan is talking about reducing the power of the government and implicitly arguing for cuts in government spending. Reductions in marginal income tax rates were the cornerstone of Reaganomics, very consistent with his message here; eliminate (A). Though Reagan did not achieve his goal of welfare reform, it did get implemented by Bill Clinton in the 1990s and is consistent with the principles here; eliminate (C). Deregulation of industries like energy and telecommunications also fits the larger goal of reducing the role of government; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because increases in federal spending on the defense budget cuts against the larger goal of trying to shrink the size of government.

Questions 52–55

This chart shows how Congress moved from Democratic dominance to Republican dominance over the course of 20 years. It is important to note how this data compares with the party that controlled the White House at various points—Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush, Republicans, were in office from 1981 to 1993, and Bill Clinton, a Democrat, held the Oval Office from 1993 through the end of the decade.

52. B The incumbent president from 1982 until 1992 was Republican. From 1994 to 2000, it was a Democrat. It would appear that voters were trying to balance the ticket by voting the opposition party into more and more congressional seats. This fits with (B) and is the opposite of the claim made by (A). The Republican congressional majority was new in 1994, so (C) is incorrect. Choice (D) is incorrect because the Contract with America was a plan offered by the Republicans.
53. C The graph shows Republicans overtaking Democrats in their congressional majorities in the 1990s. Despite Republicans' state fiscal conservatism, federal deficits have remained largely consistent in the decades since then; eliminate (A). Manufacturing has declined as employment has grown more in service sectors; eliminate (B). The narrow margins of congressional majorities seen in the later part of the graph have not increased bipartisanship since 2000; eliminate (D). Choice (C) is correct because political parties have grown increasingly polarized in the past 2 decades.
54. B From 1980 to 2000, the Republicans were strongly influenced by the policies of President Ronald Reagan. Reagan campaigned on shrinking America's government welfare system (which Bill Clinton also supported); eliminate (A). In the 1980s, evangelical voters strongly supported Republicans in restricting abortion rights in the wake of Roe v. Wade; eliminate (C). Reagan's signature policy program was known as "Reaganomics," involving major tax cuts especially for high-income earners; eliminate (D). Choice (B) is correct because in this time period, Reagan and many Republicans in Congress strongly supported reducing tariffs and supporting free trade.
55. A The question asks about a policy that the political parties shown here would agree upon. George W. Bush refused to ratify the Kyoto Protocol on climate change, and this has been a continued source of debate between the parties; eliminate (B). Immigration has been an especially salient issue especially since the election of President Trump; eliminate (C). The parties also remain highly divided over cultural debates on race and gender; eliminate (D). Choice (A) is correct because the War on Terror had strong bipartisan support in the wake of the terrorist attacks on September 11th, 2001.

SECTION I, PART B: SHORT-ANSWER QUESTIONS

Question 1

- A. Think about the opposite sides of the political spectrum each man represents—and how those opposite sides both converge in the World War I home front. Both the radical, Eugene Debs, and the attorney general, A. Mitchell Palmer, had their careers impacted by World War I, though for different reasons. Debs, a Socialist, saw World War I as a war that served only to further the interests of industrialists. In fact, Debs was imprisoned due to his outspokenness against the war and Woodrow Wilson. He even ran for president in 1920 from the comfort of his jail cell. Mitchell, by contrast, was a supporter of the war effort and was suspicious of German and Russian immigrants. As both groups were often associated with union activity (they were after all, largely working class), Palmer saw them as potential threats for staging attempts at a socialist overthrow, as was seen in Russia.
- B. Some important facts about Eugene Debs's views on American industry:
- Debs was president of the American Railway Union in the 1890s.
 - Debs was imprisoned for his role in the Pullman Strike. While in prison, he read Karl Marx's Communist Manifesto and became a socialist.
 - Debs was an early leader of the Socialist Party of America, running for president on the party's ticket numerous times.

World War I and Eugene Debs:

- Debs denounced World War I, urging folks to avoid the draft. This violated the Sedition Act, leading to his trial and conviction.
- Socialism, with roots in Germany, was seen as a foreign threat.
- The development of the Russian Revolution, which ultimately pulled Russia out of World War I to deal with its internal rebellion, raised suspicions in the United States. Government officials feared that the presence of socialists in the United States could lead to a similar rebellion, and the defeat of the United States in World War I.

Give yourself extra points for mentioning either of these facts:

- Socialists viewed World War I as a capitalist conspiracy theory that pitted workers from different countries against one another for the benefit of industrialists. The Eugene Debs–led Socialist Party of America fractured over support for the war. Debs, running on an antiwar platform from his prison cell, won 3.4 percent of the popular vote as the Socialist Party of America's candidate in 1920.
 - The Supreme Court upheld the Sedition Act (and Debs's conviction) in his appeal, Debs v. United States. A similar upholding of the Sedition Act occurred in the more familiar Schenk v. United States.
- C. Some important facts related to A. Mitchell Palmer's experiences with radicals.
- Palmer was Woodrow Wilson's Attorney General.
 - His house was damaged in 1919, when a series of bombs exploded in several American cities.
 - Following the Russian Revolution, fears of Communism spreading throughout the United States led to a series of raids, the Palmer Raids, on suspected radical groups. The Palmer Raids violated civil liberties by raiding union halls, social clubs, and private homes and ultimately deporting about 500 immigrants.

World War I and Government Agencies:

- As attorney general, Mitchell oversaw the implementation of the Sedition Act, overseeing the deportation of hundreds of foreign-born residents.
- The Palmer Raids did not come out of nowhere—the Committee on Public Information created the paranoia upon which the Red Scare developed.

Question 2

A and B—Some ways the discovery of gold in California impacted the United States:

- With 100,000 people moving West to seek riches, the population of this region exploded, leading to statehood for a number of new viable territories.
 - The development of San Francisco, located on the Pacific Ocean, created new trade options for the United States.
 - The settlement of a city on the Pacific Ocean gave access to a new wave of immigrants.
 - The Gold Rush gave impetus for the construction of a transcontinental railroad.
- C. An economic boom is a short period of economic expansion. Along with the benefits of an expanding economy are some drawbacks, namely inflation. Some later examples of economic booms include the following:
- Industrialization (Northern manufacturing cities). Per capita incomes doubled in the late 19th century as industries were able to operate as economies of scale bringing about widespread employment and production.
 - Mid-1920s boom (urban and suburban regions). A real estate bubble (more houses were built than there were people interested in buying them) and a debt bubble (fueled by a new era of advertising, people outspent their means by purchasing on margin) led to an unsustainable boom characterized by low interest rates and an unprecedented availability of credit.
 - Post–World War II boom (nationwide). With the return of workers following the war, American production and consumerism picked up, coinciding with another boom—the Baby Boom.
 - The dot-com boom (Silicon Valley, Northern California). The dot-com bubble expanded rapidly in the late 1990s due to speculation on the worth of Internet holdings. This bubble burst in 2000 when prices came back down to earth.

Question 3

It is up to you to do the analysis that will determine which of the three had the largest impact on the abolition of slavery. But here are some key points that your answer should include about each person:

- Choose one of the three abolitionists, being specific about their impact on ending slavery. Don't get too hung up on which is the "best" answer. As long as you clearly explain their impact on the abolition movement with clear facts, you should be okay on this question.
- Bolstered by facts about each abolitionist, create analysis by explaining the difficulties the two remaining abolitionists faced, as well as the barriers that existed to keep their mission from being completed as quickly as they may have wished.

Some facts you might be interested in using for both parts (a) and (b) are below:

William Lloyd Garrison

- Garrison was inspired by the abolitionist work of freed slave David Walker.
- A white immediatist, Garrison published an abolitionist newspaper known as The Liberator.
- Key to Garrison's messaging was his ability to convey the abolitionist message to white audiences.
- Garrison assisted in founding the American Antislavery Society.
- Garrison believed in pacifist methods and only reluctantly supported the Civil War.
- Garrison opposed plans by moderate abolitionists to resettle blacks in Africa.
- The Liberator was banned in some Southern states.
- Garrison saw the need to overthrow the current American regime since it was based on a Constitution that allowed slavery.

Frederick Douglass

- Douglass was an escaped slave who wrote about and spoke on freedom for African Americans.
- Douglass advocated for the education of African Americans.
- Douglass, inspired by The Liberator, published an abolitionist newspaper called The North Star.
- Against the wishes of the American Antislavery Society, which wanted Douglass to simply tell the story of an escaped slave, Douglass spoke out against the racism evident in the North.
- In contrast to Garrison, Douglass was supportive of violent rebellions against slavery, such as the one at Harper's Ferry.
- Douglass, unlike Garrison, believed that the Constitution's references to slavery were mere compromises that saw slavery as a temporary institution and that, at its core, the Constitution was an abolitionist document.

Harriet Beecher Stowe

- Stowe was a northern novelist who wrote Uncle Tom's Cabin.
- Her book used stories that Stowe had heard about plantation life from her abolitionist friends to demonstrate the evils of slavery to a wide audience.
- Stowe's approach was largely an emotional, rather than political, appeal.
- With a million copies sold, Uncle Tom's Cabin placed the slavery issue on the forefront of American society, forcing people to take a side on the issue.

- C. Oh, there are plenty. Take your pick: Lyman Beecher, Nathaniel Taylor, Charles G. Finney, Theodore D. Weld, Arthur and Lewis Tappan, Elizur Wright, Jr., Wendell Phillips, Gerrit Smith, Edmund Quincy, Lucy Stone, William and Ellen Craft, Solomon Northrup, and of course, John Brown.

Question 4

A. Factors leading to the Populist Movement

- Farmers had created an alliance through the Grange and, later, the Farmer's Alliance in order to operate as an economy of scale. These alliances gave farmers political power, allowing them to organize and support candidates.
- Farmers experienced significant debt due to a series of recessions following the Civil War, among other factors, notably the Panic of 1873 and the Panic of 1893.
- Inflation due to increased prices. With production increasing in the years after the Civil War, prices dropped and farmers could make less money with their crops. Increasing production only made the situation worse, so farmers advocated for use of silver-backed currency to bring down the value of the dollar, and thus, their debt.
- High interest rates.
- Farmers were being taken advantage of through price gouging on the railroads.
- Other groups who felt pinched by big business found an attractive alliance with one another, including unions, socialists, and anarchists.
- The Panic of 1893 led to increased membership of the Populist Party and the Democrats to nominate a Populist Movement candidate, William Jennings Bryan, in 1896.

B. Challenges faced by the Populist Movement

The Populist Movement, made up of farmers and factory workers, did not have the financial backing that the major parties, particularly the business-friendly Republican Party, had. An effective answer to this question should mention the 1896 election—the Democratic Party, riding the wave of the Populist fervor, nominated the Populists' proffered candidate, William Jennings Bryan. Following Bryan's loss in 1896, and the recovery from the Panic of 1893, the Populist Party dwindled out of significance.

In summary, it was the lack of establishment roots that caused the party its most pressing problems in terms of both funding and sustainability.

C. Future impact of the Populist Movement

The goals of the Populist Movement were not realized with the 1896 election. Bryan lost the election to William McKinley and the movement died off shortly thereafter due to improvements in the economy. However, the goals of the Populists were revived a decade later by the Progressive Movement. With more backing from urban elites, the Progressive Movement was able to accomplish many of the goals of the Populist Movement:

- Shorter work days
- Federal income tax (Sixteenth Amendment)
- Direct election of senators (Seventeenth Amendment)
- Government regulation of railroads and other public goods
- Referendums and recall elections

The Progressives, however, did not end the gold standard. That came in 1933 in reaction to the Great Depression.

SECTION II, QUESTION 1: THE DOCUMENT-BASED QUESTION

The document-based question begins with a mandatory 15-minute reading period. During these 15 minutes, you should (1) come up with some information not included in the given documents (your outside knowledge) to include in your essay, (2) get an overview of what each document means, (3) decide what opinion you are going to argue, and (4) write an outline of your essay.

The first thing you will be inclined to do, after reading the question, is to look at the documents. Resist that temptation. Instead, the first thing you should do is brainstorm for several minutes about what the question is asking of you. Try to list everything you remember about the Constitutional Convention. This list will serve as your reference to the outside information you must provide in order to earn a top grade.

Then, and only then, read over the documents. As you read them, take notes in the margins and underline those passages that you are certain you are going to refer to in your essay. If a document helps you remember a piece of outside information, add that information to your brainstorming list. If you cannot make sense of a document, don't worry. You may omit mention of one of the documents and still score well on the DBQ.

Here is what you need to look for in each document to get the most out of it:

- The author
- The date
- The audience (for whom was the document intended?)
- The significance

Remember: You are being asked to write 50 percent document interpretation and 50 percent outside information. Don't get so lost in the documents that you forget to bring in outside information. Readers will not be able to give you a high score unless you have both! What readers really don't like is a laundry list of documents: that is, a paper in which the student merely goes through the documents, explaining each one. Those students are often the ones who forget to bring in outside information, because they are so focused on going through the documents.

So, what is this DBQ all about?

This DBQ can be seen in three parts: (1) What were the ideals of the Declaration of Independence? (2) What were the outcomes of the Constitutional Convention? And (3) to what extent did these ideas differ from one another? For the first part, recall the major components of Jefferson's document (part of which is one of the documents included in this section). The themes of universal equality as well as life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness provided the young nation with lofty goals. When the time came to turn these founding principles into an actual functioning government, the Founders had to make many compromises. For the second part, discuss those compromises (e.g. Great Compromise, Three-Fifths Compromise). How did they come about? What did they look like in practice?

In the final part of the essay, evaluate the extent to which the compromises at the Constitutional Convention upheld the original ideals that Jefferson espoused. Was the Constitution, in its original form, a document that upheld equality for all? Did it have mechanisms to guarantee life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?

The Documents

Document 1: This is the most famous line from the Declaration of Independence. Authored by Thomas Jefferson, the entire document reflects the attitude of the Enlightenment philosophy. This document is key to your essay because it outlines the key values that you will be analyzing. Take the ideas presented here and hold them up to the Constitutional Convention. Were they reflected in the document that came out of the Convention?

Document 2 shows us the slave populations in the various states in 1790. Virginia is clearly the largest stakeholder in the slave system. It is no coincidence that many of the Founders (Jefferson included) were Virginian slaveholders. Think about how that may have impacted the proceedings at the Constitutional Convention. One of the toughest defenses of the Constitution is to explain why there is permissive language about slavery when the Declaration of Independence stated that “all men are created equal.”

Document 3: In Federalist 63, James Madison does not convey a high opinion of the American citizenry. In this document, he argues for the necessity of the Senate to protect Americans from themselves (Americans evidently didn’t know what was best for them). Keep in mind that the Senate, as described in the Constitution, was unelected, while the House of Representatives was chosen by the people. The thinking here is that the Senate would be dignified and educated, while the House may fall prey to people’s short-term decision-making. The Declaration was written because the colonists had no say in the decisions of the British government. Think about whether this squares with the unelected lawmakers prescribed by Madison in Federalist 63.

Document 4: Virginia had the largest population of all the states in 1790. It is not even close. Under a purely representational system, Virginia would get the most representatives in Congress. Other states, particularly New Jersey, found that unfair and the Great Compromise at the Constitutional Convention led to a bicameral house—one proportional and one with each state getting equal representation. Considering each of Virginia’s two senators represented an average of 375,000 people and each of Delaware’s two senators represents 30,000 people, it would seem that smaller states had more representation per capita in the Senate than did the large states. You should assess how this lines up with the value of equality from the Declaration of Independence.

Document 5: George Mason refused to sign the Constitution, and he aired his complaints about the document in a letter (of which this passage is only a small part). The reasons for his refusal to sign are many, but in this passage, you should focus on the contrast of “shadow” and “substance.” It appears that Mason does not regard the House of Representatives to be a true representation of the people due to their position as elected officials. You need to evaluate whether the House was successful in bringing about a representative system longed for in the Declaration of Independence.

Document 6: Like his Federalist Papers coauthor, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton does not have high regard for the masses. In this speech, he pretty openly claims that the government is to be maintained by the elite and be a check on the masses. The masses presumably would be happy with the idea of representative government and will prevent the elite from any radical changes due to their irascibility. Seems stable enough. Again, evaluate whether this is the representative government Jefferson held in esteem as he railed in the Declaration of Independence against the excesses of the British Crown.

Document 7: Following the ratification of the Constitution, Jefferson was still not happy with the new government. As author of the Declaration, perhaps Jefferson was dissatisfied with how far from his initial vision for an independent United States this new government had strayed. His specific complaints, as mentioned in this document, are the lack of a bill of rights and the lack of term limits for the president. Think about how these complaints compare with the values set out in the Declaration of Independence.

Outside Information

We have already discussed much more than you could possibly include in a 45-minute essay. Do not worry. You will not be expected to mention everything or even most of what we have covered in the section above. You will, however, be expected to include some outside information—that is, information not mentioned directly in the documents.

Here is some outside information you might have used in your essay. The information is divided into two groups: general concepts and specific events.

General Concepts

- The ideals that informed the Declaration of Independence were the Enlightenment philosophies of Europe. Jefferson incorporated much of John Locke’s ideas about natural rights, while also including the social contract philosophy of Jean-Jacques Rousseau.
- The Declaration of Independence, by word count, was primarily focused on grievances against the British Crown. The resentment toward a distant monarch was a key component of the Declaration of Independence. It also gave the Framers some idea of what to avoid when developing their own constitution. There was much thought during the Constitutional Convention about whether the executive office would too closely resemble a throne.
- Nowhere did the final draft of the Constitution stand in more contrast to the claim that “all men are created equal” than with the slavery issue. The question of slavery was left to compromise, rather than aligned with Jefferson’s lasting words. It should be noted that Jefferson, along with other Framers, owned slaves. Viewing slaves as property, some Framers may not have actually seen the contradictory nature between the two documents.
- One common theme that seems to arise in the Declaration as well as the Constitution (at least in the Bill of Rights), is the concept of freedom. Drawing from Jefferson’s understanding of Locke, the Declaration sees freedom and self-determination as a fundamental human right. These same ideals are on display in most of the amendments in the Bill of Rights.
- Ask whether the new constitution had created a republic or a monarchy, Benjamin Franklin is said to have remarked, “a republic, if you can keep it.” The precariousness of the new republic did not necessarily lend itself to the quixotic ideals of Jefferson’s document. Rather, the Framers needed to create a system that would last. While freedom and liberty were key themes in the Constitutional Convention, the need to create a stable republic may have been the primary goal for many of the Framers.

Specific Events

- The Philadelphia Convention is important to investigate, since it gives us insight into what ideas were bandied about. The Framers came with a variety of perspectives, many of which were limited by compromise. In this regard, the Philadelphia Convention may have seen very little of any specific ideal from the Declaration of Independence carried out to its pure iteration.
- For an even closer analysis of the ideas debated at the Constitutional Convention, look no further than the Federalist Papers. Hamilton, Madison, and Jay argued in favor of the Federalist perspective and were often critical of unbridled liberty. Some of the values articulated by Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence were tempered by appeals to stability in the Federalist Papers.
- The Federalist Papers were written to convince the New York delegation to ratify the Constitution. The wavering opinion on the Constitution stemmed largely from an opposition to federalism. There was concern that the Constitution would not guarantee the freedoms fought for in the Revolutionary War (and promised in the Declaration of Independence)—that states would have self-determination free from an outside government.

Choosing a Side

The first thing you want to do is to decide what kind of a statement you are going to make. You have already brainstormed all your outside information, made some notes or a quick outline, and decided where to plug in the documents. Because there is no right way to answer this, and many ways to make your argument, here are some positions you might want to argue.

- By including slavery and an unequal representation of people around the nation, the Constitutional Convention provided a clear shift away from the ideals presented in the Declaration of Independence.
- Through the protections offered by the Bill of Rights and limitations placed on the power of the government, the Constitution is a true manifestation of the values articulated by Thomas Jefferson in the Declaration of Independence.
- Although the Founders aimed to carry the lofty goals of the Declaration of Independence into the Philadelphia Convention, the compromises that were necessary to create a Constitution limited the document to a point at which it only partially conveyed the ideals of the Declaration.

Planning Your Essay

Unless you read extremely quickly, you probably won't have time to write a detailed outline for your essay during the 15-minute reading period. However, it is worth taking several minutes to jot down a loose structure of your essay, because it will actually save you time when you write. First, decide on your thesis and write it down in the test booklet. Then, take a few minutes to brainstorm all the points you might put in your essay. Choose the strongest points and number them in the order you plan to present them. Lastly, note which documents and outside information you plan to use in conjunction with each point. If you organize before you write, the actual writing process will go much more smoothly. More importantly, you will not write yourself into a corner, and suddenly find yourself making a point you cannot support or heading toward a weak conclusion (or worse still, no conclusion at all).

What You Should Have Discussed

Regardless of which thesis you choose, your essay should discuss all of the following:

- The Constitutional Convention
- The Declaration of Independence
- The Great Compromise
- The Three-Fifths Compromise
- The contrasts between large states and small states
- The contrasts between northern states and southern states
- Thomas Jefferson
- Checks and balances
- Federalist Papers, Alexander Hamilton, James Madison, and John Jay

Give yourself very high marks for outside knowledge if you mention any five of the following:

- George Washington
- Articles of Confederation
- New Jersey Plan
- Virginia Plan
- Bicameral legislature
- Benjamin Franklin
- George Mason
- George III
- Electoral College
- Bill of Rights
- Committee of Eleven

Give yourself a pat on the back if you mention any of the following:

- Virtual representation
- Roger Sherman
- The presence of slave owners at the Convention
- John Locke
- Gouverneur Morris
- Caucus system
- Elbridge Gerry
- Edmund Randolph

SECTION II: THE LONG ESSAY QUESTION

Question 2

This essay asks you to evaluate a series of laws passed by the British government that were intended to exert control over the colonists. We all know that taxation without representation was a key argument of the Declaration of Independence, but the 1767 Townshend Acts went beyond taxation. They created new courts to serve the monarchy's interest, while also disabling colonial self-rule. In this essay, consider how colonists reacted to the acts. Those reactions were the seeds for the revolutionary actions that would follow at Lexington and Concord in Massachusetts, in Independence Hall in Philadelphia, and on battlefields throughout the colonies.

You should start the essay with an explanation of the Townshend Acts—they were implanted by Charles Townshend, the minister of the exchequer under prime minister William Pitt. The acts were varied, but served to simultaneously strong-arm and fundraise off the colonists. The Townshend Acts came in the wake of colonists withholding the salaries of government officials in a negotiating ploy.

What to mention about the Townshend Acts:

- The law provided colonists with a tax on goods imported from Britain. This was a departure from earlier practices that saw taxes on European goods, though not on British ones.
- The Townshend Acts used revenue collected from duties to pay government officials stationed in the colonies.
- New courts and government offices were established in the colonies in order to more efficiently execute royal orders.
- The New York legislature was temporarily shut down as punishment for refusing to supply British troops.
- The Townshend Acts also permitted British officials unfettered access to private residences if they suspected smuggled goods.

Give yourself extra points for mentioning the following:

- The Townshend Acts had precedent. The Declaratory Act from the previous year established the crown's authority to tax and legislate throughout the colonies.
- The British power to search private residences was known as a writ of assistance.

Colonial reaction to the Townshend Acts:

- The Massachusetts Circular Letter called for protest against the law. What is important is that this was one of the first ways the various colonies cooperated to plan resistance.
- Boycotts against the acts led British merchants, who were fast losing money, to join the colonists' cause.
- Colonists bought American goods as a form of protest, boosting the New England economy.
- Parliament's eventual repeal of most of the Townshend duties reinforced the power of the colonists' organizing power.
- When the British began paying their officials with revenue from the new duties, colonists formed Committees of Correspondence, cementing the union of colonial resisters to the British crown.
- Mary Otis Warren wrote pamphlets in favor of a revolution against the British.

Give yourself extra points for mentioning the following:

- The colonists had a road map for resisting the Townshend Acts: Patrick Henry and the Sons of Liberty effectively put pressure on Parliament to repeal the Stamp Act in 1766.
- British quartering, made worse by the Townshend Acts, ultimately led to the Boston Massacre.
- John Dickinson's Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania was a unifying force for colonists resisting the Townshend Acts.
- The First Continental Congress was established in order to discuss colonial grievances about British taxation.
- The colonies united with a Continental Association, which was intended to enforce boycotts.

About the Structure of your Essay

You need to explain why each component of the Townshend Acts inspired anger and resistance in the colonies. Then, explore how each of the colonial reactions to the Townshend Acts brought the colonies closer together and another step toward revolting against the Crown. All of the facts you can include are great—just make sure to use analysis to make it clear how the events surrounding the Townshend Acts brought both parties toward the Revolutionary War.

Question 3

This essay asks you to investigate two periods of immigration. Be specific about who immigrated to the United States during each period, giving a couple examples of immigrant experiences from each wave. Pay close attention to which experiences are similar (continuities) and which were unique to each wave of immigration (changes).

Mid-19th Century

- Irish immigration
 - Many left Ireland due to famine (potato famine)
 - Moved to northern cities
 - Competed with laborers for jobs
 - Experienced hostility due to anti-Catholic bias
- German immigration
 - Many left to escape civil unrest (1848 revolution in Germany)
 - Moved to the West and Midwest
 - Competed with laborers for jobs
 - Tended to be higher educated than Irish immigrants
 - Many Germans were Catholic and experienced hostility due to their religion

Give yourself extra points if you mention the following:

- Both groups allied with Democrats due to the party's working class outreach.
- "No Irish Need Apply" signs
- Anti-Catholic riots in northern cities (there was a famous one in Philadelphia in 1844)
- Nativist parties such as the Know-Nothings
- The temperance movement targeted Irish and German immigrants and promoters of social ills such as drinking alcohol.
- Unions prohibited immigrants from joining their ranks
- Transcontinental railroad construction

Industrial period

- Immigrants and migrants made up the majority of city populations.
- Immigrants typically settled into ethnic neighborhoods (Little Italy, Chinatown, etc.) in tenements.
- Anti-immigrant bias waged against non-Protestant groups and those not considered white
- Knights of Labor and other unions petitioned the government to restrict immigration.
- Haymarket Riot
- Birds of Passage—immigrants who came to the United States to work and then return to their former countries

About the Structure of Your Essay

You would begin by explaining the two periods of immigration. A strong essay would follow up the introductory paragraph with body paragraphs that juxtapose the eras based on themes. In other words, it's preferable to have a paragraph that evaluates the causes of each wave of immigration and another paragraph that analyzes the challenges experienced by immigrants from each period than it is to just write a body paragraph on the first era and then a body paragraph on the second era.

Question 4

Like the other prompts, this question is asking about change and continuity. The important thing is to develop a position first: that Reconstruction policies led to a lot of change, or did not lead to a lot of change at all.

To support the former position, some evidence you could include might be the following:

- The creation of the Freedman's Bureau
- The Enforcement Acts used to prosecute members of the Ku Klux Klan
- New amendments to the Constitution including the 14th Amendment guaranteeing the rights of citizenship to former slaves and the 15th Amendment guaranteeing the right to vote to former slaves
- The increasing power of the federal government over the states with new laws like the Pacific Railway Act and Homestead Act (although these weren't explicitly Reconstruction laws, they do fit into the larger theme as they were passed in the same time period by the same Congress that was writing most of the Reconstruction laws)

To support the latter position, some evidence you could include might be the following:

- The Compromise of 1876, which installed Rutherford Hayes as president and removed Union soldiers from the South
- Supreme Court cases such as the Slaughterhouse Cases that dramatically limited the power of amendments like the 14th Amendment
- The creation of Jim Crow laws in southern states that were supported with Supreme Court cases like Plessy v. Ferguson
- The growth of sharecropping to replace slavery in the South'

Ultimately, the best arguments will be able to show evidence from either position but still stake out a definitive claim in favor of one or the other.
